She strode toward the village, a thriving little center with up-to-date shops and a modern moving-picture theater.

June had never cared for picture shows and seldom went inside the theater, but today something took her to the box office almost before she realized what she was doing.

Next to her sat a young mother who was trying to keep an active child quiet. She had given the tot her handbag and the lipstick and metal vanity case had both dropped to the floor and rolled down the aisle. June had recovered them for the impatient mother.

In a distant part of the house another small child kept up a continuous shouting. A wee baby cried lustily. June could hear and see nothing but these outraged children, cooped up within a stuffy, dark theater. Then, like a flash, an idea came to her. Her discouragement was replaced by wave after wave of enthusiasm for the inspiration that had come to her.

She could hardly wait to get home to tell her mother.

"Mother—I have a great idea!" she cried as she descended upon her tired parent in the kitchen getting supper. "I'm going to start a new profession of my own—movie mothering!"

"Movie—" gasped Mrs. Aiken.

"Oh—no—no—no, dear! Not in the movies. I'm going to be a mother to kiddies whose own mothers are so picture-mad that they can't stay home from matinees to care for them. I shall charge only twenty-five cents for a child for the whole time from three to five—or whenever the show is out—and I shall advertise myself thoroughly so as to be able to get as many as eight or ten kiddies each afternoon."

Her mother, always mentally keen if bodily tired, responded at once to her daughter's mood and began to plan with her for the new venture. In a short time they had made definite arrangements to use their own living room and porches, turning the former into a sort of nursery playroom. They telephoned to several friends who might send them some little tots to begin on, and it was only a short time until June found herself custodian of kiddies all the way from two months old, asleep in their prams, to boys and girls of five.

"Mother, what do you think I've made this week?" asked June at the end of the third week of business.

"I couldn't guess, but you've been a busy girl and your youngsters seem to thrive on your care," said the mother fondly.

"I've made exactly $17.25—with no expense," she said, happily. "Isn't it wonderful? And to think the idea came out of a clear sky."

The mothers always brought the children's milk if they were to have any, or biscuits or fruit, so that June found herself without even the expense of buying a few things to eat.

During the fourth week she had a call from a young man who at first glance she knew could hardly be the father of children.

"Miss Aiken?" he asked.

June nodded. "June Aiken—Matinee Mother," she replied, laughing.

Bob Stoner told her quickly what he wanted. His mother was dead and he and his sister, eighteen, had helped to bring up the two babies the poor mother had left. His sister wanted to get out now and earn her own living and there would be no one to take care of the babies. His sister wanted to do only some part-time work she had been offered and Bob had heard of June Aiken. Could she care for the little brother and sister during the afternoons?

June was delighted. The children were to be brought to her by their sister early each afternoon on her way to her own work and Bob was to call for them in the evening.

"It means seven dollars regularly, mother," said June.

What she did not say, however, was that she would be glad to look forward each evening to the coming of big Bob Stoner. They had not smiled into each other's eyes for nothing that first day.

But June did not let her growing fondness for Bob interfere with the profitable and enjoyable little profession she was building up for herself. She kept adding to her equipment as she found it necessary and in time had to press her mother into service and hire a woman to do her mother's heavier work.

"But—some day you will want to—to have a home of your own?" Bob asked her after he had known her for months.

"Oh, yes, some day, Bob, when—when your sister and brother and all the other kiddies are old enough not to need me. Then we—we will think of—our home. Meantime, let's be happy as we are."

And Bob, having learned his lessons of patience and unselfishness, was willing.

Ignorant of the values of foreign money, flyers of the first American detachment gambled with it by matching bills of the same color, according to a young aviator whose war diary has been published in Liberty. "We shoot craps in our staterooms," he wrote, "and I am gradually collecting all kinds of money—Italian, French, English, and best of all, a little American. The Most Wonderful Book in the World

MORE than thirty million Bibles or Books of the Bible were sold or distributed in 1925.

Would you not love to have companion volumes to help you discover the treasures in that Wonderful Book?

SWEDENBORG

explained the Bible's practical application to daily life; how it describes the life hereafter; what the Bible parables mean when spiritually interpreted.

His theological works—as issued by himself—have been published by the Houghton Mifflin Co. in most modern translation from the original Latin, in the Rotch Edition of 32 volumes.

The first twenty give the spiritual sense of Genesis and Exodus as understood in Heaven; and volumes 26, 27, 28 give likewise the spiritual sense of the Book of Revelation.

Volume 29, Marriage Love, views from the union of the Divine Love and the Divine Wisdom the Law of Sex throughout all creation. It shows the crown and jewel of the Christian Religion, the union of one with one only. Price $2.00.

Volumes 30, 31, 32, contain a full statement of the True Christian Religion as revealed from Heaven. $3.00 the set.

The whole 32 volumes in half-morocco at $125; in buckram, $40.

The following are the best introductory books to the Revelations of SWEDENBORG. They are in large print, bound in buckram, and contain from 260 to 485 pages.

Who Was Swedenborg?

Emanuel Swedenborg, the son of a bishop, was the great Swedish scientist, philosopher and theologian, whose vast range caused Emerson to term him the mastodon of scholars. Dr. Parkes Cadman recently named him the Universal Genius. Officially connected, by appointment of the King, with the great mining industry of Sweden, he mastered all the sciences of his time, and wrote the most useful books on metallurgy, minerals, geology, astronomy, and the human brain. His life search was for the human soul. How his spiritual senses were opened, after he was 50 years of age, that he might reveal the human soul, the life after death, and the Bible itself, may be read in the above named, uplifting, useful books.

THE FOURTH HORSE MUST BE MAINTAINED

A man farming an eighty acre plot could possibly fulfil all of his power needs with one team or three horses.

But horses are not infallible, and during a time of particularly heavy work, it is often necessary to change teams, in order to save the horses or carry on the work, if one of the animals gets sick. That is why the farmer maintains four horses at all times, although his actual power needs can be met by three.

The fourth horse is his standby Power.

The Electric Company also maintains a fourth horse. In order to provide for breakdowns or emergency power demands, there must be kept in readiness, power generation facilities somewhat in excess of the maximum load.

It is the standby power that insures the customer service on demand and that instantaneous service is what makes electricity so valuable in the home and in business. The maintenace of that fourth horse is expensive but we keep him for your every call.

It Pays To Advertise

That it pays to advertise what you can do on your farm has again been proven. You will remember reading a news item in our issue of the News on Friday September 3rd, in which we mentioned the fact that Fred Voth, a farmer living about three miles southeast of town had raised seventy-one bushels of Gopher oats to the acre.

The Immigration Bulletin issued by the Division of Immigration for the state of Minnesota, reprinted this item in their issue of Sept. 13th and it will now be read by many more interested people who like to see what we can raise here.

Let us know how your crop is turning out.

Dr. L. R. Twete, state licensed veterinarian of Thief River Falls was a business caller in town on Saturday. While here Dr. Twete inspected the certified dairy herd owned by O. J. Backlund. He said that this herd has one of the best records of certified cows in this part of the county.

ANYONE CAN LOAN MONEY

A good loan is one that is paid at maturity. Banking is the scientific loaning of funds to its customers for short periods. There is no business in the world conducted on so small a margin of profit as banking.

For this reason a bank must loan its funds with a feeling of absolute safety. There are two reasons for this: First,-for the protection and solvency of the bank; Second,-because the funds loaned belong to the depositors and their interests must be the bank's first consideration.

No customer of this bank can borrow a dollar of our depositors' money unless his financial statement warrants the loan, (The State Banking Department insists that all unsecured loans of $100.00, or more, have the borrower's statement attached.) or ample collateral pledged to secure the loan. More and more bank borrowers pledge collateral to secure loans. This is good practice on the part of the borrower and good business for the bank.

We are able at all times to accomodate our customers with funds for the further development and improvement of Holt territory. Good loans are solicited, poor ones will not be taken on any basis.

Never Sold His Cream To The Centralizers

A farmer was telling us the other day that he never sold his cream to a centralizer, no matter if they offered him a higher test and bigger price, but always stood by his farmers' co-operative creamery; that if he couldn't get along with his own co-operative creamery, he found another and sold his cream there. To men of his stamina and principle—men who could see the dollar of next year by refusing the bribe-nickel when they did—to men like him is due that this region today is prosperous. Such men kept the co-operative creamery alive at a very critical period. The co-operative in its turn, has caused this entire section to be millions of dollars better off than it would have been had the centralizers exterminated the farmers' creameries.—Jordan Independent.

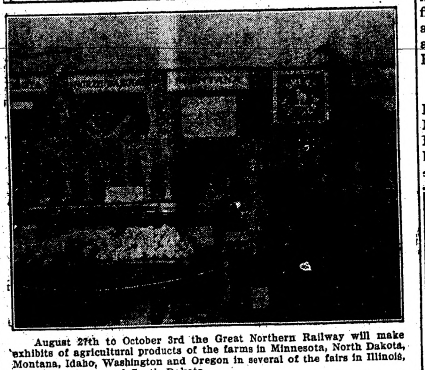
Great Northern Exhibits Products of Northwest at Eastern Fairs



August 27th to October 3rd the Great Northern Railway will make exhibits of agricultural products of the farms in Minnesota, North Dakota, Montana, Idaho, Washington and Oregon in several of the fairs in Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa and South Dakota.

The principal ones are the Central States Fair and Exposition at Aurora, Ill., Aug. 27th to Sept. 4th—Walworth County Fair, Elkhorn, Wis. Sept. 6th to 10th—Tri-State Fair, Sioux City, Iowa, Sept. 19th to 24th—Dairy Cattle Congress, Waterloo, Iowa, Sept. 27th to Oct. 3rd, and Corn Palace, Mitchell, S. D. Sept. 27th to Oct. 1st.

Exhibits will be of the same general character as those made in 1925 of which the above illustration is an example. Grain, forage, enlarged photographs and transparent illuminated pictures are displayed on the back wall from 30 to 60 feet in length. Tables and stands are used for displaying vegetables and fruit. Vegetables and fruits are preserved and shown in beautiful glass jars. Others are shown fresh as in the illustration.

The exhibit consists of the principal agricultural products including all kinds of grain, alfalfa, corn and other forage, potatoes, sugar beets and numerous vegetables and all kinds of fruits that are produced extensively along the Great Northern Railway in the northwest. Framed photographs and enlarged transparent photographs show scenes of farms, fields, buildings, dairy herds and other livestock such as cattle, sheep, hogs.

The space occupied by the exhibits ranges at the different fairs from 8 to 10 feet in width and from 30 to 60 feet in length.

The locations of the fairs are selected with a view to reaching the territory in which high class diversified farming, dairying and livestock raising is practiced and where there are many renters and farm owners who are interested in securing low priced good agricultural land for a new location.

The exhibits are kept open from early in the morning until late at night. Representatives of the railroad are in charge to explain the exhibits and see that everyone interested in the country secures complete information and printed matter describing the different states. Thousands of illustrated books describing the country will be placed in the hands of farmers.

Politics Still Quiet

Candidates for office at the ensuing general election are most of them still inactive. State committees are just beginning to function, but little is heard of either national or state political matters, while county politics is as yet scarcely heard of. Sometimes a slow start means a swift finish, and, occasionally, it is found that the people's apathy is more apparent than real, but if one were to judge from present appearances he would say that we are in for a dull, lifeless campaign.

LAKOTA DENTIST DISCOVERS LARGEST PUFF-BALL ON RECORD

Lakota, N. D., Sept. 11.—Dr. Horace B. Foster, Lakota dentist, while motoring on the Burtness Scenic highway the other das found the largest puff-ball on record the huge mushroom weighing eleven and a half pounds.

Prior to this find the largest puff-ball ever found was found by D. W. Siebenthaer near Dayton, Ohio, and was 45 inches in circumference and weighed eight and a quarter pounds. The puff-ball is on exhibition in the window of a drug store at Devils Lake.

Dr. Foster as a hobby has made a life study of birds and flowers and is recognized as an authority in certain lines of botany and ornithology.—Grand Forks Herald.

CHANGED NAME TO DETROIT LAKES

Detroit Lakes, Minn., Sept. 8 Detroit, Minn., passed out of existence today as the result of a vote Tuesday on the question of changing the town's name. Detroit as a name was all right, but citizens have had too much trouble with mail, and express being missent to Detroit, Mich., so they picked Detroit Lakes, Minnesota.

The vote was 4 to 1 in favor of changing the name. An amendment had been approved by the city council previously and this was filed with the county auditor today, making the change effective. It will now be easy to determine whether the speaker refers to Henry Ford's town or to the delightful Minnesota summer resort town.

STORY FROM THE START

Brandon Cathewe, young writer, has bought a newspaper in Bannister as part of his plan in becoming a "force" in the town, which position he must attain if he is to court Betty, daughter of Dunleigh Mansfield, steel magnate of the town. Cathewe prints a story telling how Mansfield has defrauded a workman of a valuable invention, which has made Mansfield rich. Doctor Maddox learns that Cathewe is the son of Digby Hallowell. Nancy, the doctor's daughter, is Betty's chum, and together they read the article. Mansfield learns that Cathewe is the new editor.

Mansfield recalled what he could of that remarkable interview. Why, the fellow had caught the spirit of the jest, but had pinned the jester down to a gentleman's agreement.

Gone to Bannister, bought that semi-Socialist sheet, all with the idea of winning Betty! The fellow ought to be looked over by the commission in lunacy.

In one manner or another he must be driven out of Bannister, where he did not belong.

Mansfield's prerogatives had been encroached upon, and the encroacher must be punished, as an example and a warning to other editors that one man ruled the destinies of Bannister.

Suddenly he had it; and the illumination chilled him slightly. Reprisal! The whole affair on shipboard a blind, Betty a pretense.

The son of some man he had broken via Wall Street method. The affair now had sense and significance. Reprisal!

Very good. What he had meted out to the father he would mete out to the son!

* * * * * * *

I wish I had some new words to describe Nancy and Betty or that I could twist the old ones about in such a fashion as to make them look new! To have described these two young women a thousand years ago, when the language blocks were freshly painted!

Both of them had beauty. The beauty of one was cloudlike; a summer cloud, brilliantly white against the blue, changing subtly and continuously, mirrored on the stream—a serene beauty. Her lovely white arms were spread out on each side of her. Her skin, reflecting the firelight, was like a goldbeater's leaf, and there were magic threads of gold in the blue iris of her eye. Her hair was a ruddy brown, like the leaf of the copper-beech in October.

The other girl was resting her elbows on her knees, her chin in the cup of her palms. She was as pretty as a hollyhock: homesy, frank, and friendly. Good folks—a summer cloud and a hollyhock!

There was no continuity to Nancy Maddox's thoughts. They were like butterflies, wheeling and turning in a most wonderful garden.

These amazing two weeks in Washington! It seemed to her that she wasn't real, that in some mysterious fashion she had been incorporated between the covers of an English society novel. Ambassadors and diplomats, officers from all parts of the world, heroes and politicians! Men with brains to sell. And they danced with Nancy Maddox because she was Betty Mansfield's friend.

Betty! How they flocked about her, these men! She was like a whirlpool, drawing every one toward her, and quite as unconscious of her power as any real whirlpool. Nancy had learned a stupendous fact, that the great in soul are always simple and genuine. And this lovely girl at her side was totally free of artifice.

"Betty, you baffle me," Nancy said one night. "Sometimes I think I know you; then I'm sure I don't."

"How—why?"

"You are so beautiful that I find myself watching you constantly. And I can't get away from the idea that you are watching and waiting for something or someone. The eager way in which you greet new men! I thought at first it was one of those little tricks women use to trap men's interest. But not you. I have noticed that after you've talked a little while with a new man you leave him utterly bewildered by your sudden lack of interest."

"And so you have noticed! I wonder if others have? Nancy, have you ever been in love?"—rather intensely.

"I don't know, Betty. There is a young man in Bannister I'm very fond of. I'm afraid I am fonder than it is wise to be, since no act or word of his has ever carried him over the boundary line of friendship. He's the queerest boy! Merry and whimsical and shrewd; but sometimes I sense recipices in his soul, depths that I cannot see into. Father says he is the finest young man he ever met. But there! I'm not in love that I know of. It may happen, but I'm not going to let go until he gives me the right to."

Betty stood up. She swept a hand across her eyes. "Oh, I must tell someone, or go mad! I dare not tell daddy. Besides, he would not understand. He doesn't believe in 'Brushwood Boys.'" Betty suddenly dropped to her knees and seized the bewildered Nancy's hands. "Romance! Nancy, do I look like the kind—am I the kind—for any man to play with? I mean, is it right that any man should hurt and mock me when I have wittingly harmed no one? It isn't fair, it isn't fair! Love! As if one could say howdy-do to it and then good-by!"

"Betty, whatever has happened? I just knew that something was wrong. But there must be some mistake. No man would hurt and mock you intentionally."

Betty turned and sat on her heels, staring into the crumbling embers. She drew one of Nancy's hands down across her shoulder and held it tightly.

"Letters!—from the sky, the clouds, the stars, burning with fire. Oh, he must have loved me! He couldn't have written like that else. The first was beautifully written, full of poetry and music . . . and love. I read it and threw it into the empty grate. But I went back and recovered it. There was a phrase that kept singing through my head, and I wanted to see if I had interpreted it correctly. Well, I put the letter away."

Nancy laid her free hand on the beautiful hair and stroked it.

"Of course I wondered who and what he was. I had nearly forgotten the letter—a month later—when the second one came, quite as wonderful as the first, which I resurrected for comparison. They were absolutely unlike except in theme. That was love. No answer was expected, for there was neither name nor address. A month later the third letter came. And then I began to wait for them, eager and thrilled. For nearly three years they came, Paris, London, Cairo, direct, there was never any forwarding marks upon the envelopes. Some one who knew where I was, where I was going. That alone fascinated me!"

"From where were they mailed?"

"Always from New York. I carried an autograph album about and lots of young men have written their names in this album. But I never found the one handwriting I was in search of."

"But it would be easy to disguise that!"

"I made them write a paragraph with three or four sentences—quotations. It wasn't the writing! It was the style of punctuation by which they ended a sentence."

"I don't understand."

"I was hunting for a curious period—a little x instead of dot, such as you and I make. A man might change the style of his stroke, but habit would lure him into making that odd little period, so I believed."

"And you never found it?"

"No. There was always a postscript to these letters. 'Some day I shall come to you.' Five months ago the letters ceased to come. What has happened? Is he dead? If alive, why doesn't he come to me? Nancy, I'm much afraid."

"Of what?"

"That he has created in my heart something that will always be there."

"Love?" whispered Nancy.

"I don't know what it is, but it is beginning to hurt dreadfully. At first, when I got a letter, it made me curiously happy. I'd sit down at the piano and sing happy songs. Now I can't play anything but sad ones. What is happening to me? Whatever can it mean? I'm afraid."

"He may be ill."

"He would have found some way of notifying me."

"He might be too old and afraid to come."

"Oh, Nancy, he is young—like I am! I know it. But if I could only stamp out the thought of him, free myself. I am watching and waiting and searching. I am always straining my ears for some sign. He doesn't come. And now he writes no more. Where and under what circumstances did he first see me? Have I really met him? Do I know him? What impelled him to write like that to me? No man would make sport of me. My brain is in a turmoil. I would have disobeyed father and remained in France but for the hope that if I came home I might meet this strange and unusual man. Nancy, I am hurt."

"Burn the letters," said Nancy, indignantly. "It is going back to them that holds you. Burn them. Cut the Gordian knot."

"I've tried . . . and I can't!"

CHAPTER IV

An Encounter.

On the sunny side of a huge bowlder, on the top of a rusty green hill, sat a man with a small book on his knees. He wore a gray flannel shirt, tieless; a pair of brown corduroy trousers, much the worse for wear; and a pair of ugly russet walking boots.

Eastward, several church spires were visible in the late September haze. There lay the city of Bannister. Nature, hating the ugly, hid it as well as she could. Farther east, a drab smudge, which seemed to shut off the world beyond.

Whenever the man's gaze went back to his book, his expression was one of contentment. Whenever this gaze shifted toward the spires, an ironical smile twisted up the corners of his lips. He frowned, for they were after him down there. Nearly all the local advertising had fallen away, the stockholders were exhibiting signs of restiveness; and that signified that Mansfield or his agents had approached them.

His thought went to his mother. What a thoroughbred she was, to stick to him on his crazy adventure, to follow his fortunes, when she might have remained in the peace and seclusion of the villa up Fiesole way, with that riot of roses in the springtime and the sun on the red roofs of Florence! Cathewe, her maiden name; and to be forced to prefix it with Mrs. in order to share his fortunes!

There came an interruption—the whine of an automobile. A plague of them; a man had to climb the Matterhorn these days to find solitude.

"Sandy!" cried a woman's voice from the far side of the bowlder. "Sandy, come here! . . . Sandy!"

The automobile whizzed by. Cathewe recovered his book and stood up resentfully. But this resentment died swiftly.

On the slope just beyond the ditch, where he had been flung, lay an Airedale, motionless. Kneeling beside him was Betty Mansfield, her hands clenched against her bosom, her eyes full of unshed tears.

"My dog! My friend and comrade!"

Cathewe dropped his book, ran across, looked at the dog for a moment or two, then picked him up tenderly and carried him back to the sunny side of the bowlder, where there was a patch of warm clover. The girl followed, dumbly. Not a word was spoken until Cathewe put his hand over the dog's heart.

"Is—is he dead?" she whispered.

"No." His hands roved hither and yon over the dog's body. "We'll wait a minute. I can't find any breaks. Probably stunned."

"My poor Sandy!"

A moment later Cathewe received a slight but pleasurable shock. He had reached for the dog's head the same instant as she, and their hands touched. A great bitterness swept over him, for the aftermath of that pleasurable shock was the knowledge that he still cared.

A shudder ran over the Airedale; and presently the stump of his tail began to beat the turf, feebly.

"Sandy?"—joyously.

"He's all right," said Cathewe, confidently. "Simply knocked out. He's in luck. It's mighty hard to keep a dog these days; and yet I can't honestly blame the motorists. The animals will run at the cars. This is a particularly fine breed. Never saw anything like him around these parts. Big and strong enough to tackle bear." He began to pat the broad head. And the wag of the tail became more energetic.

Something in the wind. Wait for the next installment.

Time to Demonstrate Claim to Efficiency

A sarcastic old Irishman, the president of a small but well-known industrial company, was anxious to show production figures and he sent word for a brand-new efficiency expert who had succeeded in talking him into the ways of ultra modern business administration. The expert had succeeded in worming his way into a vice presidency as "vice president in charge of personnel." A messenger came from the expert:

"Mr. Jones says he is tied up and cannot get away."

The president drew a breath of satisfaction that the new executive had begun so industriously. He talked 20 minutes and again sent for the expert.

"Mr. Jones says he is tied up but is trying to get away."

The president didn't like this, but waited 15 minutes before trying again. The same answer came back, so he penned this note:

"Houdini gets out of a straight-jacket and handcuffs under water in 40 seconds. I don't expect this from you but would appreciate your getting untied very soon or not, claiming you're such a tremendously efficient guy!"

Not Appreciated

"My dear fellow," said John Clayton, "I wrote to a man who had sent me an abominable play, and said, 'My dear sir, I have read your play. Oh! my very dear sir! Yours truly, John Clayton.'"

I told this story on many occasions with great success. At last I told it to one who did not laugh. He was my secretary. It seemed to me hard, indeed, that one's own secretary should not laugh at one's funny stories. It appeared to me that he had mistaken his vocation, and I said in a tone of some irritation, "You don't seem to think that funny." Said he, "No, I don't. It was to me Mr. Clayton wrote that letter!"—From "A Player Under Three Reigns," by Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson.

On Being "Different"

A car full of boisterous young people was honking its way through the crowded streets when one of the girls called the attention of the others to a strange-looking man walking their way on the sidewalk. He was of indefinite age and very shabby; but what made him conspicuous was his hair, hanging, gray and gnarled, below his shoulders.

"Wonder what's the idea," said the driver of the car; "anybody can borrow a scissors!"

"Why," laughed a merrymaker from the rear seat, "he probably wants to be 'different!'"

Doubtless the least probable cause of this man's eccentric appearance was a deliberate desire to be "different." Far more likely, was indifference to his appearance to which hardship and stress had numbed his consciousness.

But the thought is inescapable that many people do make themselves unhappy and ridiculous in an effort to be "different," to stand out apart from the rest of us.

A few weeks ago a play was produced with the title "Different," in which a young girl was so obsessed with the thought that her fiance, whom she dearly loved, was "different" and better than other men that the discovery of a trifling peccadillo in his past which made him, in her eyes, no longer "different," impelled her to banish him from her sight forever. Both spent the succeeding years in hopeless longing for each other. Two hearts were broken and two lives wrecked on the altar of being "different."

A genius was known to have said that he would cheerfully give all his fame in exchange for a happy childhood which he had never known because he was "different" from other boys.

And yet there are people who want to be "different," and, lacking unusual qualities to distinguish them from ordinary humans, they affect poses and postures and eccentricities of dress or manner which make them only ridiculous. I know a woman who when small hats and short skirts are being worn, deliberately affects long skirts and floppy hats because she imagines that this difference from the "common style" makes her exclusive, ultra-refined, "different," whereas it merely makes her appear dowdy and ridiculous.

The first tenet of refinement is to be inconspicuous; and if to be "different" from others implies being superior, more refined, then particularly would it not be achieved by advertising or attempting to evidence it by eccentricity. True distinction inevitably makes itself felt; but to be merely "different" for its own sake is a very shallow ambition.

His Outstanding Characteristic

The wife of Sir Henry Bartle Frere, the distinguished English statesman once had to meet him at a railway station. She took with her a servant who had never seen his master.

"You must go and look for Sir Bartle," said Lady Frere.

"But how shall I know him?" asked the servant.

"Oh," said Lady Frere, "look for a tall gentleman helping somebody."

It is told that the servant found Sir Bartle assisting an old lady out of the railway carriage and so recognized him by the description.

Some one else might have helped the old lady, but they didn't. Even in an age of so-called super-civilization it was possible to distinguish a man by this one characteristic.

About how many of us can it be said that a stranger might recognize us by the fact that if there was anyone in need of help—and there usually is—we would be found helping? On a trolley car would we be known because we gave our seat to a tired-looking old lady? In the rush of modern strenuosity could we be distinguished because, more strenuous than our fellows, we have time to lend a helping hand.

Too often we are like the young fellow who was introduced by a charming maiden to her mother. He responded to the introduction, then said: "It seems to me that your face is very familiar, Mrs.—"

"Well!" the good lady replied, "It ought to be. I stood right in front of you when you were seated on the uptown car for one full hour."

Here is a secret. Ever notice the contented look in the eyes of some elderly person who has never been too busy to help others? Whether those receiving the help appear grateful or not, there is a peculiar pleasure to being helpful, and the people who miss out on this joy miss out on one of the best parts of life.

Windows Placed High

The best light comes from the upper part of the room, not the lower and is needed on a level with the eyes rather than below. This fact makes it possible for an architect to plan his window spaces six or eight inches higher than usual, about two and a half feet from the floor. This extra space in turn gives the housewife an opportunity to make use of the space beneath the window for bookcases, desks, etc.

Decapitation Adds to Insects' Lives

At a recent session of the Academy of Science Professor Bouvier read a curious paper written by R. P. Cambouet, noted entomologist and for many years a missionary in Madagascar. The purport of the paper was to the effect that the lives of butterflies could be prolonged by cutting their heads off in such a way as to avoid a hemorrhage—an operation which, it would appear, can be performed by an expert.

Cambouet declares that he has tried the experiment successfully with eighty butterflies and that his patients—if that is the word—not only retained "all their faculties and were able to reproduce their species, but the average span of their lives in every case was prolonged by from one to two weeks."

Riveting Hammer Has Electrical Competitor

Is the voice of the riveting hammer to be stilled? For years it has ranked close to the flivver's cough as "the great American sound," but now a new method of fabricating steel frames is rising. Electric welding which erects the skeleton of a building of many members melted into one piece instead of as a collection of beams riveted together, is looming. A two-story garage of this type has been built in Canton, Ohio, and now contracts have been let in Pittsburgh, Pa., for two five-story buildings—the first in the world whose members and joints have been designed especially for electric welding. The speed of construction is far greater than by the well-known catch-hot-rivets-in-a-bucket-and-hammer-'em-home method, and the cost is estimated to be less.

WHY DENY YOURSELF THE BEST IN MOTOR CAR BODIES

The finest of the new cars in all price classes have now been announced—Cadillac, Buick, Chevrolet, Oakland, Oldsmobile and Pontiac.

All offer vastly greater values than ever before in motor car history.

All register amazing advantages in performance and ease and economy of operation.

But the greatest factor of their new glory is described in a single phrase—Body by Fisher.

Here is their supreme beauty—setting absolutely new standards in charm of design and interior fitting.

Here are unequalled factors of safety which add so much to your comfort and confidence.

Here are exclusive conveniences and niceties which do, indeed, make the car with Body by Fisher superior in its class.

No matter what mechanical developments may allure you, it is the body of your car with which you live most intimately—that is why the General Motors units, makers of the best of the new cars in all price classes, point so proudly to the emblem—Body by Fisher.

With the finest of the market to choose from there is no reason why you should deny yourself the greater safety, beauty and comfort which only a Body by Fisher can give.

The Farmer And His Wheat;

An Allegory From The Horton (Kansas) Headlight.

Once a farmer had 1,800 bushels of wheat, which he sold, not to one grain merchant, but to 1,800 different dealers, a bushel to each. A few of them paid cash, but far the greater number said they would pay later.

A few months passed and the man's bank account ran low. "How is this?" he said. "My 1,800 bushels of grain should have kept me in affluence until another crop is raised; but I have parted with my grain and instead I have raised a vast number of accounts so small and scattered that I cannot get around to collect fast enough to pay expenses."

So he posted up a public notice and asked those who owed him to pay quickly. But few came. The rest said, "Mine is only a small matter and I will pay some other day," forgetting that, tho each account was very small, when all was put together it meant a large sum to one man.

Things went on thus. The man got to feeling so bad that he fell out of bed and awoke. Running to his granary, he found his 1,800 bushels of wheat still there.

MORAL: The next day he went to the publisher of his paper and said; "Here, sir, is the pay for your paper, and when next year's subscription is due, you can depend on me to pay it promptly. I stood in the position of the editor last night, and I know how it feels to have his honestly-earned money scattered all over the country in small accounts."

Law's Slow Process

A fortune of $150,000 which has been lying in chancery in England for almost a century, has just been divided between two brothers and a sister. YOU CAN'T PUT A PRICE ON SERVICE

The most valuable feature of electric light and power is service.

In spite of its importance, it is so intangible that it cannot be itemized on your bill.

If electricity were put up in handy packages and you were able to call at our office for it, that matter of service would be simplified.

To give you service, it must be instantly available on demand. When the button is pressed, the energy must be there ready to respond for whatever the chore requires. To make electricity thus available requires constant cost and vigilance.

That is SERVICE.

The cost of service cannot be measured. Only the actual current consumed can accurately be charged to the consumer.

Our employees go the limit, even to endangering their own lives, to give you the best possible service.

ANYONE CAN LOAN MONEY

A good loan is one that is paid at maturity. Banking is the scientific loaning of funds to its customers for short periods. There is no business in the world conducted on so small a margin of profit as banking.

For this reason a bank must loan its funds with a feeling of absolute safety. There are two reasons for this: First,-for the protection and solvency of the bank; Second,-because the funds loaned belong to the depositors and their interests must be the bank's first consideration.

No customer of this bank can borrow a dollar of our depositors' money unless his financial statement warrants the loan, (The State Banking Department insists that all unsecured loans of $100.00, or more, have the borrower's statement attached.) or ample collateral pledged to secure the loan. More and more bank borrowers pledge collateral to secure loans. This is good practice on the part of the borrower and good business for the bank.

We are able at all times to accomodate our customers with funds for the further development and improvement of Holt territory. Good loans are solicited, poor ones will not be taken on any basis.

STORY FROM THE START

Brandon Cathewe, young writer, has bought a newspaper in Bannister as part of his plan in becoming a "force" in the town, which position he must attain if he is to court Betty, daughter of Dunleigh Mansfield, steel magnate of the town. Cathewe prints a story telling how Mansfield has defrauded a workman of a valuable invention, which has made Mansfield rich. Doctor Maddox learns that Cathewe is the son of Digby Hallowell. Nancy, the doctor's daughter, is Betty's chum, and together they read the article. Mansfield learns that Cathewe is the new editor. Betty tells Nancy she is intrigued by several love letters received from an anonymous writer, but which suddenly have been cut off. Later, Cathewe meets Betty on the outskirts of the town. Her dog, Sandy, has been hurt.

The girl on her part began to observe. First, the hand, which was lean and brown and well kept. The sleeve of the shirt, however, was frayed at the cuff. The shirt also lacked the top button, and there was a sunburned patch at the base of the throat. Brown corduroys, such as Italian roadmenders wore; and the hems were tucked into dusty russet half-boots. (As a matter of fact, Cathewe kept these togs in the office, where he could don them whenever the lure of the highway called, which was every day when the weather was good.) The sight of his face, however, had the effect of a blow. Where had she seen this handsome, vigorous face before? Somewhere; she was positive of that. Fine, sensitive gray eyes and a mouth which would have been called beautiful in a woman. And above this mouth she saw the replica of her father's nose. Then, from the corner of her eye, she saw the book. Jean Fabre, in the original! The face and hands of an artist, the clothes of a day-laborer, and a volume of Fabre on insects! She almost forgot the dog.

"Sandy is all right. Eh, old top?" Cathewe held out his hand.

The dog eyed the hand, quizzically, and approached. He permitted the strange hand to stroke his head, and his tail wagged a little.

"Well!" said Betty, getting up. "Sandy never permits strangers to touch him."

"But all dogs know me," said Cathewe, picking up his book. "Fine comrades, aren't they? I had a little dog a while gone. He was just plain dog. But that didn't matter. We understood each other at once."

Of all the unusual men! was her thought. What a beautiful head! Certainly she had seen it before. But where? She must find out who he was. No man so odd as this one could wander about Bannister without being known.

"Pardon, but have I ever met you before?" she asked suddenly.

"I dare say you have seen me from your car."

"Probably that is it. Fabre. You are reading him in the original?"

"Good mental exercise."

"I suppose the ant's life must be very interesting to you."

"Indeed, all life is interesting. Come along. I will show you an ant city, a Canton of the insect world."

Presently the philosopher came to a broad, flat stone. Very carefully he put his fingers under the edge and with a quick heave sent the stone over. The cavity was aswarm with ants. Battalions and regiments scurried about.

She gazed fascinatedly at the black atoms. They were taking hold of the eggs and drawing them rapidly into innumerable subways.

Ostensibly Betty was interested in the new ant city, but her eyes did not convey any memorable impressions to her brain; that was busy with conjecture. A gentleman of her own sort, because he was courteous and unembarrassed. Apparently he knew that she was Dunleigh Mansfield's daughter, and was not in the least awed by the fact. That rather pleased her.

He did not introduce himself, which was another good sign. It left her free to recognize him the next time they met or pass him by. She was quite confident that he was not a native of Bannister. An out-of-doors man and a scholar; the shabby clothes now fitted into the scheme of things. Men did not pursue their studies in natural history, dressed as for a tea party. Who and what was he?

Nancy Maddox would know, for Nancy knew everybody in Bannister. He would be very easy to describe. Doubtless she would be meeting him during the winter. She still retained the vague impression, however, that she had seen him before, and not in Bannister.

"Thank you," he heard Betty say. "It has been very interesting. I have read Maeterlinck on the bee, but Fabre is an undiscovered country. Come, Sandy; we must be going."

There was an impulse to offer her hand to this unusual young man, but she smothered it. She turned back toward the highway, the dog leaping and barking joyously.

"A lucky dog," said Cathewe, smiling. "He has defied the law of irresistible force and lives to tell of it. Good afternoon."

He crossed over to his boulder and once more reclined against the sun-warmed granite surface. He waited for a little time, then peered around. Her hat was just vanishing down the drop of the hill. He opened his book—upside down.

"The postern gate!" he murmured.

At half after five Nancy was agreeably surprised by the advent of Betty.

"Nancy, I've had the queerest adventure," began Betty at once, and rather breathlessly. "No; I don't want any tea. I came for some information. It was so droll and unusual."

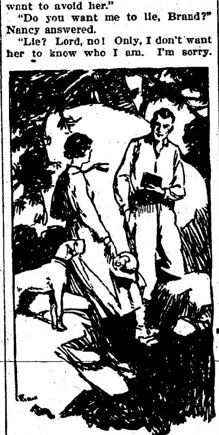
And lightly, with those Gallic gestures which came so naturally she recounted what had taken place on the top of the hill.

"Dressed like a tramp and reads Fabre in the original," mused Nancy. She was about to hazard a guess when the telephone in her father's office rang. "Just a moment, Betty. Telephone. It may be some patient of father's." Once at the instrument she recognized Cathewe's voice.

"Nancy, I've had rather an odd experience; and I'm going to depend upon you to help me out. I've met Mansfield's daughter. Please do not disclose my identity. You understand? I want to avoid her."

"Do you want me to lie, Brand?" Nancy answered.

"Lie? Lord, no! Only, I don't want her to know who I am. I'm sorry.



"It Has Been Very Interesting."

Don't lie on my account. Tell her if you must. Good-by."

Slowly Nancy set the receiver on the hook. She did not hasten back to her guest. Why was her heart heavy with foreboding? At last she returned to the living room.

"Dressed like a tramp," she repeated, "and reads Fabre in the original. It might be one of your father's chemists, Betty."

Nancy hated lies, and she hated herself for telling this one, when it was not obligatory in the least. She was a little afraid.

* * * * * * *

After his interview with Nancy Cathewe went in to his mother.

"Play something before the maid comes in to light up."

"What do you want me to play, sonny?" in a soft, Southern drawl.

"Rachmaninoff's Prelude."

"Then things aren't well with you?" How easy it had become to read the boy's mood by the kind of music he wanted!

She sat on the bench, but she did not begin the Prelude. Instead, she struck the opening bars of Farwell's Norwegian Song, plaintive rather than melancholy. She could dimly see him, his chin in his palm, staring at a pattern in the Chinese rug.

"Better?" she asked softly.

"I am always better when I am with you, mother. Life is an astonishing mess, isn't it? For the innocent as well as for the guilty. I, who have never wittingly harmed anyone or done a mean thing, I must always carry with me the sense of being hunted, the fear of being found out. And I have dragged you into it."

"Sonny, I'd be very happy with Nancy as my daughter," she changed the subject.

"The substance rather than the mirage. But I don't love her, mother. I know that. But is the other a mirage? Nancy says not. What a muddle! My new book—I'm afraid I'll have to chuck it. There are too many other things buzzing about in my head. Here comes Mignon. Dinner's ready."

* * * * * * *

In the great manor on Polygon hill, Betty sat curled upon the broad window seat, watching the receding gold and scarlet of the September sunset. That is, she seemed to be watching it. In reality, she was just recovering from a stunning, paralyzing mental blow. The door to the Apocalypse had opened slightly. On her knees lay a crumpled newspaper. She found it on the floor of the limousine, where some sardonic jester had tossed it.

"My father! They lie, they lie!"

Down below, in the study, a local banker eyed the end of his cigar through half-closed lids. Mansfield, his fingers pyramided, watched him expectantly.

"Do you want some unsolicited advice?" asked the banker, finally.

"Go ahead with it," said Mansfield, smiling tolerantly.

"Clean up these grogshops, which you really own. Tear down your rotten firetraps. Give the reform candidate the city hall to play with for two years."

Mansfield laughed.

"Dunleigh," continued the banker, "the people are thinking. They are finding the true cleavage between right and wrong. I warn you, they are going to do away with this political game as you and I know it. This fellow Cathewe is no ordinary disturber. I defy you to find a libel in his editorial comments. That boy goes down among men. He hasn't accused you of doing anything criminal, as understood by law. He attacks you from the moral side. Mark me, he'll soon be after your new munitions plant. The temporary hospital you have erected is too near the tanks. An explosion would knock it to flinders."

"Let the city fire department advise me about that," answered Mansfield, shrugging his shoulders.

"They are afraid of you, and you know it. If anything does happen out there—for lack of water—it will be criminal negligence; and this fellow Cathewe will hang your hide on his wall."

"Well, how much has he borrowed to keep his vituperous rag going?"

"Nothing."

"How has he kept going on, then?"

"I'll come to that in a moment. There are but seven stockholders in all. They have promised never to dispose of their interests to you."

"But I don't want the rag. All I need is to have him lose his following."

"And he isn't losing it. The paper's circulation is growing daily, despite the fact that you struck off his local advertising. Something really vital is going on. The poor are beginning to boycott the shops that have withdrawn their advertising at your command. Soon the advertisers will drift back, of necessity."

Mansfield frowned.

"Dunleigh, there's a mystery I can't get to the bottom of. There are four banks in Bannister. Being president of one of them and a stockholder in all of them, I am in a position to find out things. This young fellow Cathewe has an active account in each bank, and it is evident that he is paying the losses out of his pocket. Once a month he replenishes these withdrawals."

"Drafts on New York?"

"Cash. Nothing traceable."

"How much is his active account in each bank?"

"One hundred thousand dollars, cash!"

"Nearly half a million?" gasped Mansfield, with a full feeling in his throat.

"Yes," continued the banker. "Four hundred thousand will keep his paper going without advertisements for ten years. Another queer thing. I don't know about the other banks, but at mine he has two accounts; one general and one special. The general account is never more than two or three thousand. The special account is never drawn against except to pay the paper's pay-checks and expenses. Four hundred thousand, behind a newspaper like the Herald, has a tremendous power. My advice is to get your political and financial house in order."

Mansfield gets some advice from an important source in the next installment.

American Writer Who Turned to Buddhism

It is common for people of other lands to come to America and become citizens of the United States, but we seldom think of Americans taking out naturalization papers and so becoming citizens of some other country. Yet one famous American writer did just that.

This writer was Lafcadic Hearn, who was really an American, although he was born on a Grecian island of an Irish father and a Grecian mother. At the age of sixteen he ran away from London, and then came to this county, where he worked on a number of newspapers. Later he was sent to Japan to write articles for a magazine. He became so fond of that country that he spent the rest of his life there, adopted the Buddhist religion, became a Japanese citizen, dressed in the costume of the country and married a Japanese wife.

Hearn thus became almost completely an oriental, and better than any other occidental he has told us about the people of the Far East. Having himself become one of them, he was able to understand them more fully than any other westerner.

GIRLS OF SCHOOL AGE LEARN VALUABLE LESSON

Find Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound a Dependable Medicine

LOUISE LOUTHAN
ROUTE 2, CHARLESTON, ILLINOIS

From the days of the polonaise to the days of the radio, mothers have given this dependable medicine to their daughters. School girls are often careless. They get wet feet. They overstudy or they tire themselves with too many dances and parties. They get run down.

Many an active girl of today, like the demure maiden of the 1870's, has found that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is helping her to find better health and energy.

"I gave my fifteen-year-old girl Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and it did her a wonderful lot of good. She had been out of school for four months. I read the advertisements of the Vegetable Compound, and since she has taken it she has improved and has gone back to school again. I recommend the Vegetable Compound to other mothers with girls who are not as strong as they should be."—Mrs. Alice Louthan, Route 2, Charleston, Illinois.

"My daughter was out of school two terms. I have known about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound all my life and finally decided that she should try it. Three bottles helped her in various ways for the next couple of years."—Mrs. W. E. Gillette, 986 E. 52nd Place, Los Angeles, Calif.

"I have always been sickly, and until I was fourteen my father was very strict about my perfect attendance at grammar school. I have gone to school through hard storms and often taken cold. When I was fourteen I took to my bed and did not get up for eighteen months. Everyone thought I could not live. Just four months ago I began taking your wonderful medicine, Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and I could notice a great change almost at once. Now I feel like a new person. I wish all girls would try Lydia E. Pinkham's wonderful medicine."—Mrs. C. M. Smith, Union Village, Vermont.

How Times Change

Jean, age ten, living in Park avenue, has been in the habit for several years of visiting her cousin Oliver in the country for a week each summer. This summer she said nothing about going. She showed none of her former enthusiasm for making the journey, and finally her mother said: "Well, Jean, how about the visit to the farm this summer?"

"Oh, I don't think I'll go," she replied.

"Why not?" asked the mother.

SHE WAS AS TRUE AS STEEL

By ALVAH J. GARTH

(©, by W. G. Chapman.)

"POOR boy! dead or alive, which?"

Old Abner Dorsett sat crouched over the embers of a dying fire in his desolate home. Time was when he had stormed and raved whenever he thought or talked of his missing son. He had disowned him, had almost cursed him. Time, however, had softened the smart of a terrible disappointment, a severe blow to fatherly trust and affection.

Wilfred Dorsett, bright, handsome, twenty-two, engaged to Una Walden, the prettiest girl in Winsted, had been sent to the city by his father to invest the earnings of years, some fifteen thousand dollars in bonds. He had kissed his neighbor's daughter, gentle Una, good-by with all his accustomed sincerity. He was to return in two days. On the third there came an appalling telegram. It read:

"Forget me. I have lost all the money through gambling."

From that day until this, through two lonely, heart-breaking years, old Abner Dorsett had gone about the deserted house like a dazed, dumbed creature unable to rally from a deadening shock.

It was Una who had won him finally from his bitterness and despair. Whatever her sufferings, poor girl, she never let the world know their depths. She hid her misery with a smile. She felt it her duty to care for the poor old man, whose life, like her own, had met with sudden, devastating shipwreck. She nursed him through a severe fit of sickness. Every day now she visited him, tidying up the house, often preparing his midday meal, bringing him tempting dainties. Always was she cheerful, loving and attentive. And as to Wilfred—her lips would tighten with a slight touch of pain, her eyes momentarily become humid, but she would say bravely:

"He will come back some day—a new Wilfred Dorsett. Oh, I know it will be!"

The old man, aroused from his reverie as there was a suspicious noise, a sort of rustling and cackling. Then with bright eyes and cheeks glowing with excitement, Una burst into the room through the rear doorway.

"What now, Miss Mischief!" charged Mr. Dorsett, rousing up magically under the influence of that bright spirit.

"A turkey!" was the smiling reply. "We got two fat, young, tender ones. Mother insisted that I bring this one over. It's alive and there is a bag of corn with it. Some real turkey weather will come along, and I will be over here to cook it for you and help you eat it."

"Always thinking up some way to do me a kindness!" murmured the old man, greatly moved. "If only—"

He paused there, and her face fell, too. Each instinctively thought of the wanderer they so missed and so cherished. Then Una chased away the gloom by talking of the mince pie and cranberry sauce they would have at their prime feast!

It was not often that Una attended any unusual functions. Hers had become a home life, but once in a while some close girl friend would tease her into attending a party or reception. That same evening the brother of such a friend became her escort to a birthday celebration in the next town. He had shown marked attention to Una, and she regretted it and decided this would be the last time she would accompany him.

An open carriage from the livery called for them. The driver sat muffled up on the front seat in his great coat. Una's escort carelessly regarded him as the sleepy-headed driver he usually employed, and after they had driven a mile or two, to the distress of Una, made a flat proposal for her hand in marriage.

"I am very sorry," she said, "but you must not speak of this again."

"There is some other?"

"There always has been!" murmured Una softly; "it will be always the same."

The driver moved, stirred with some deep emotion, but silently drove them to their destination and back home again. When he took the team to the livery he handed its proprietor a bank note with the words:

"Thanks for catering to my fancy to act as a driver on a special occasion," and kept his face shaded, as during his spell at the lines.

Mr. Dorsett got up his turkey appetite the next day. That evening Una, her father and mother and her sister were invited guests, and it cheered up Mr. Dorsett to be in such friendly company. Una looked charming in her spotless white bib and tucker. She would allow no one to help her in the preparation of the meal. She hustled from kitchen to dining room, fairly in her element.

"All ready!" she announced at last, and the well-browned turkey was ushered into evidence. "That is strange!" spoke Una, returning to the kitchen and finding the outside door slightly open. She picked up the covered dish of sweet potatoes, carried it to the table and sat down, feeling she had done her duty and was ready for the due reward.

"I declare! this is simply grand and neighborly"—began Mr. Dorsett, and then he came to an abrupt pause, the cover to the potato dish in his hand. He dropped it to stare past a steamy veil within the dish at a neat rubber-banded package of papers.

"What's this?" he exclaimed, and then fell back, overcome. "Bonds!"

"Bonds?" repeated Una, vaguely, rising up from her chair and hurrying over to his side.

"Yes," uttered Mr. Dorsett, hoarsely, as though some quick suggestion brought partial illumination to his mind, "and the same bonds identically that I ordered two years ago and that Wilfred—Wilfred— What does this mean?"

"It means—it must mean Wilfred!" ventured Una, with a speedy gleam of intelligence.

"Did you call me?" interrupted a new voice, and there in the doorway stood—Wilfred Dorsett!

The old man got up, shaking from head to foot. Una stood staring, palpitating.

"It's all right, father," spoke the newcomer, moving to the side of Mr. Dorsett and placing a loving, gentle hand upon the silvered white head.

"You true angel!" burst forth the returned wanderer, and his arms were extended, and Una ran into them. "Ah, you were all ready for me!"

Yes, there, as at every meal Una attended to in the lonely house, was the plate set for the missing one. Next to it she had sat and there a moment later those two were together.

"I slipped that package into the dish just now in the kitchen," explained the returned outcast. "I drove you over to the party last night, Una. I heard your answer to your escort. Then I knew I might hope."

"He has come home—he is back with us again, my son! my son!" cried Mr. Dorsett, the tears streaming down his furrowed cheeks. "Redeemed—reformed, I can see it in his face at this blessed moment!"

"Not much to reform, father," corrected Wilfred. "It was all regret. I told you that gambling led to the loss of your fifteen thousand dollars. In a way, yes. I was foolish enough to take a chance in a card game for a dollar, which I lost. The gamblers saw that I had a lot of money—followed me, knocked me senseless and stole it. I took a mighty vow never to return home until I could replace the money. Yesterday, with a good deal more than fifteen thousand dollars, earned honestly in the Alaska gold mines, I bought those bonds for you."

And Una, she who had never forgotten him or faltered in her fidelity, kissed him fondly, and was content.

Declare Emotion Is Handicap to Women

Why are men generally chosen for responsible posts in preference to women?

Ardent feminists have always challenged masculine employers to produce a satisfactory answer to this question. The only argument advanced hitherto is that women are apparently more emotional than men, and that, therefore, their intellectual as well as physical powers tire more quickly.

A series of tests carried out on men and women students at Glasgow university by Mr. R. D. Gillespie, a physiologist, gives scientific confirmation to this view. The results show that the average rise in the pulse rate of women is nearly 37 per cent higher than that of men doing the same mental work under similar conditions.

Why this is so has not yet been determined, but Mr. Gillespie suggests that an emotional factor may have been the cause.

The men and women students were given vertical columns of four single-digit figures to add up. The figures were arranged on a moving tape, and the student had to call out the results of the mental arithmetic to an observer, who noted them down. The duration of the experiments was from five to fifteen minutes, and they were performed on separate days, with a week's interval between each.

Only two of the thirteen girls tested admitted having been excited emotionally during the course of the test.

The best feminist propaganda in the face of these results would be to conduct a similar test on men and women engaged in the same kind of mental work as a means of livelihood.

Good Reasoning

A housewife had an unexpected guest. The only dessert the house afforded was a pie. But the hostess knew it was a poor pie—one of her bad-luck pies. To her surprise the guest profusely praised that poor pie. A few weeks later the same man was again her guest. This time she had a good pie. To her surprise he said not a word about her good pie. Finally she asked him, "I don't understand it. The last time you were here I had a poor pie, and you praised and praised it. Now I know I have a good pie, and you never said a word about it. Why is it?" The guest answered, "I'll tell you, sister. That first pie needed praising."—The Outlook.

California Sends Shad

Although the shad originally was an eastern fish and was first transplanted to the Sacramento river of California in 1871, in late years the Sacramento shad has increased rapidly, while his eastern cousin has dwindled nearly to the point of extinction as a commercial product. The shad is a favorite fish in Washington and the annual Potomac shad bake is one of the big events of the chamber of commerce. In reality, however, most of the fish advertised as Potomac shad are from the Sacramento river, says the San Francisco Bulletin.

Scientists Can't Tell Why Cells "Wear Out"

It is bacilli which are responsible for almost all untimely snuffing out of human life. Scarcely any one dies from senile decay. There is really no such fatal disease as "old age." No one knows why a man wears out. Scientists have yet to probe to its source the dark mystery of the disease of the cells which prevents them, after a certain period of years—varying with individuals—from renewing themselves.

Sir Ernest Rutherford, Doctor Harrison, Doctor Doppler, the Viennese surgeon, and Dr. Alexis Carrel, the wizard French surgeon who is head of the great Rockefeller institute of America, lead the group of international scientists who are tirelessly striving to penetrate this greatest of all secrets—the mystery of the death of the cells.—London Tit-Bits.

Bonaparte Relic for Arlington Cemetery

A relic of the captivity and death of Napoleon Bonaparte on the island of St. Helena, is to be placed in the Arlington National cemetery. It is a cutting from a weeping willow tree planted by Cuyler Reynolds, on his estate at Alton, N. Y., in 1900, which tree was originally planted in New Jersey in 1870, as a slip from a tree planted in front of Napoleon's tomb at St. Helena in 1821. That slip was brought to the United States by Justice Charles P. Daley, at that time president of the Geographic society.

The historic cutting will be planted near "Sheridan Spring," just inside the Sheridan gateway, on the east side of the cemetery, on the military road, separating the abode of the heroic dead from the Arlington experimental farm. If it thrives it will be the only weeping willow tree within the limits of the cemetery.

Fast Workers

According to the bureau of labor statistics the output per man in the iron and steel industry has increased 50 per cent since 1914, when most of the men were on a 12-hour day schedule. They now work 8. Efficiency in boot and shoe making has increased 17 per cent in the same period. The most amazing augmentation of effort, however, is found in the making of automobiles, where the output per man is now three times as great as it was 12 years ago.—The Outlook.

ANYONE CAN LOAN MONEY

A good loan is one that is paid at maturity. Banking is the scientific loaning of funds to its customers for short periods. There is no business in the world conducted on so small a margin of profit as banking.

For this reason a bank must loan its funds with a feeling of absolute safety. There are two reasons for this: First,-for the protection and solvency of the bank; Second,-because the funds loaned belong to the depositors and their interests must be the bank's first consideration.

No customer of this bank can borrow a dollar of our depositors' money unless his financial statement warrants the loan, (The State Banking Department insists that all unsecured loans of $100.00, or more, have the borrower's statement attached.) or ample collateral pledged to secure the loan. More and more bank borrowers pledge collateral to secure loans. This is good practice on the part of the borrower and good business for the bank.

We are able at all times to accomodate our customers with funds for the further development and improvement of Holt territory. Good loans are solicited, poor ones will not be taken on any basis.

July Honor Roll is showing up fine although not quite as large as the June report. Braaten heads the list with Davis a close second. Third place is taken by a patron who was quite aways down on the last list. A. Steinhauer is still among the tops and Moberg has stepped up in line considerably since June when he was the eighteenth member on the roll and now holds fifth place, and so on down the line you will notice the change from month to month.

From now on the milk production will be dropping off to some extent, yet I hope the Land-O-Lakes cream will be on the increase at least it should during the colder weather.

Butter prices have gone up a few cents since the first of September which means a higher price for butterfat to the patron. Those that have winter cows will reap the biggest profit if prices stay up. If you haven't any winter cows at present it should be worth your time to get in line. Prices are usually better and your time is not so limited during the winter months.

ANNOUNCEMENT

[Inserted and to be paid for by W. O. Braggans at regular rates.]

BRAGGANS FOR County Attorney

If you beleive I have made a fairly good County Attorney, I ask for your support

W. O. Braggans, the present County attorney, took office November 1, 1923, to fill the unexpired term of the late John R. Naeseth. He has conducted the affairs of his office with credit to himself and the County and is now a candidate to succeed himself. Mr. Braggans was born November 9th, 1876. He attended the public grade schools at Kingsville, Ohio, until 14 years of age, when he was obliged to leave school and seek work. He did not again attend school until he entered the law department of the University of Minnesota in 1898. Upon leaving the grade schools he worked in the nail mills and glass factories in and around Wheeling, W. Va., and in 1892 came west, settling at Milbank, S. D. He studied law in the office of Thos. L. Souck while working as a stenographer and was licensed to practice law in S. Dak., in 1898. That fall he entered the law department at the University of Minnesota, and graduated therefrom in the same class with Julius J. Olson of Warren, and was licensed to practice law in Minnesota in 1900. He immediately entered the employment of the Supreme Court as a stenographer and stayed there until appointed Court Reporter by Judge Grindeland of Warren in 1903, when he came to Warren, where he has since resided. He was married in 1901 to E. Letha McKenzie of Knox City, Mo., and they have three children, a girl now working in a law office in Chicago as a stenographer, and two boys now attending the public schools at Warren. Mr. Braggans is somewhat of a self-made man as indicted from the fact that he did not receive much schooling; he is industrious, capable and if re-elected will do his best to serve the interests of the people of the county.

HOW I IMPROVED MY HEALTH

Did It in Less Than One Month

As Mrs. Weaver herself says, "I was never very strong." This is a mild statement describing her condition, for, according to her letters, she was subjected to no small amount of ill health. Fortunately, her sister was familiar with Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and begged Mrs. Weaver to try it. "After three or four weeks," writes Mrs. Weaver, "I felt a great difference in myself. I would go to bed and sleep sound, and although I could not do very much work, I seemed stronger. I kept on taking it and now I am well and strong, do my work and take care of three children. I sure do tell my friends about your wonderful medicine, and I will answer any letters from women asking about the Vegetable Compound."—Mrs. Lawrence Weaver, East Smithfield St., Mt. Pleasant, Pa.

If you knew that thousands of women suffering from troubles similar to those you are enduring had improved their health by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, wouldn't you think it was worth a trial?

In some families, the fourth generation is learning the merit of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

A droll idea entered Mansfield's head. He was not without humor. So he returned to his desk, looked into the telephone book, and called a number. A woman's voice answered.

"I wish to speak with Mr. Cathewe."

"Just a moment, please."

Three or four minutes passed.

"Hello! This is Mr. Cathewe. What do you wish to speak to me about?"

"I wish to ask you some questions, frankly. Why do you hate me?"

"I do not hate you. My attitude is absolutely impersonal."

"That's blunt enough. What would you say if I expressed the opinion that you carried out your part of the bargain, and that the hour had arrived for me to carry out mine?"

A long pause.

"Events have made that impossible. I release you."

"You do not hold me, then? Still, I am a good loser. I will introduce you to my daughter."

"Between your daughter and me there is the space of two worlds. I regret that folly on board the ship. Moreover, I am a poor man. Every dollar I have in this world I earn by honest labor."

"I don't quite get that. I have been duly informed that you have on deposit nearly half a million."

Another pause.

"That money does not belong to me, Mr. Mansfield."

That was the end of the conversation.

Mansfield then wrote two letters. The first was local. It was to the chief of police. It demanded as quickly as possible a good photograph of Brandon Cathewe. It did not matter how it was obtained. The second letter was directed to a celebrated detective agency in New York. The best man they had was wanted immediately.

"Dinner is served, sir," announced the butler from the doorway.

"Is Miss Betty down?"

"She begs to be excused, sir."

Mansfield ran upstairs and rapped on the door of his daughter's boudoir.

"It is father, Betty. Are you ill?"

"No, daddy. Just tired and headachy."

"May I come in?"

He heard the key turn in the lock, and he pushed in the door. He saw instantly that she had been crying.

"I . . . . I saw that article in the Herald," she sobbed. "It made me wild with fury. After you have done so much for Bannister!"

A warm glow pervaded his heart.

"You mustn't waste any tears on that twaddle, Betty. It's just politics; it's all a part of the game."

"Come along to dinner. I've got a surprise for you. I'm sending for your aunt, your mother's sister. You ought not to be the only woman in this big house. Your aunt is a charming woman. And there is one thing, little lady, I want you always to remember: Your mother's fortune makes you rich in your own right. Do as you please with it. And when the day comes and you find a man of your fancy, marry him. I'll trust you to pick out one worth while."

He laughed, tucked her arm under his, and led her to the stairs.

Around about ten that night you would have found her on the floor before her boudoir fire, reading her letters. She would read so far into a letter, and then a picture would drift in between: blue sky, blue water, the vague scent of clover, and an odd young man bending over flat stones.

She wanted to throw the letters into the fire. It was imposible. She knew that she would have regretted the act throughout her life. But to find some way out of the thraldom!

She put the letters in a Florentine box, which she restored to a drawer. She was about to close this when her eye was attracted by a slip of paper. It was a typewritten list of the bonds and stocks and accumulated funds of which her private fortune consisted. Away down toward the end she came upon something which she had not noticed previously: "Fifty shares the Bannister Morning Herald!"

"The only way you can break an editor," she murmured, "is to buy his sheet and turn him adrift."

Thereupon a great and glorious idea popped into her head.

CHAPTER V

George Cottar.

Mansfield could not read. He tossed his volume upon the table and got up. He lighted a cigar; then he went into the hall for his hat and topcoat. He left the house through the conservatory door.

It was moonlight, and a stroll about the gardens might settle this unusual mental turmoil.

He passed along the aisles of rose bushes. There were still some flowers in bloom. He pushed through the bushes to the next row, where there was a magnificent pink Arends. He cut it with his penknife and drew it through his buttonhole. He threw away his half-consumed cigar. Then he glanced again at Betty's window. It was dark.

In the very center of the gardens was a marble basin, with a faun seated at one end, his pipes emitting thin streams of water. The tinkle of the water sounded pleasantly on Mansfield's ears. Pipe tobacco; and good tobacco, too. One of the gardeners'? No; they all smoked abominable weed.

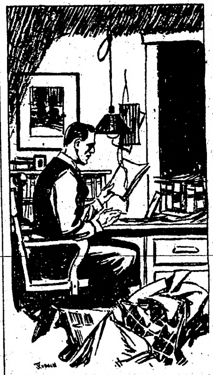
"Who's there?" he demanded sharply.

The shadow began to move. Mansfield, being in vigorous health and sound of wind, ran along the path. He made a short cut, and arrived at the sidewalk as the other ran across the street diagonally. This maneuver set his face under the full glare of the street lamp.

Mansfield stopped. Cathewe, prowling around in the gardens? The fool, then, was really in love with Betty! He could give up the woman he loved for the sake of an ideal—an ideal which, if pursued unfalteringly, might break her father.

Mansfield returned to the house, his usually cold and precise brain off its balance. The whole affair was so absurd that it resembled a dream rather than a reality. He hung up his hat and coat mechanically, plucked the rose from the buttonhole, and proceeded to his room immersed in reverie.

He had missed something. No; it wasn't romance. He had had his fill of that—in steel. He knew what he had missed. It was the thing that had lured that fellow Cathewe to come prowling into the gardens, merely to stand under Betty's window. Love!



His Editorials Were Full of Punch and Prophecy.

Slowly he rose, picked up the vase in which he had placed the flower, tiptoed into the hall, and set it before Betty's door.

Next morning Betty came into the breakfast room with a joyous rush. She was as pleasing to the eye as a summer cloud; in a filmy white, a pink boudoir cap on her head, and the rose pinned to her bodice.

"Daddy Mansfield, did you put this rose by my door?"

He could not answer her directly. "I thought perhaps you had gone to bed. There won't be many more this year."

She walked over to him and stooped. "You may kiss me for that." He took her head between his palms and kissed both her cheeks, soundly. She ran back to her chair and began to volley French at him. Finally he laughed.

"You're too much for me. My French is motor-truck style."

"Daddy, I want to go back to France."

"But I need you, honey!" he cried. And as the words passed his lips, the miracle lay revealed. That was it, he needed her.

"Why do you need me, daddy?"—in a kind of terrified whisper.

"Because I love you. Because I've only just found it out."

* * * * * * * *

Cathewe's newspaper, for all that it was losing money daily, was a success. Its editorial opinions began to be copied far and wide across the land. He thought and wrote clearly upon all subjects. His editorials were full of punch and prophecy.

But he was losing money. He had heard tales about Moloch, and now he understood. Each additional boost to his circulation made a corresponding loss. Without the local advertisements this ascending popularity was becoming more and more costly. And any day his stockholders might sell out. This would not nullify his control, but it might add infinite confusion, internal warfare.

So far he had won two big battles. He had made the health department an efficient organization and he had blocked a deal by the local traction company (Mansfield's) to charge a six-cent fare. And he had made the last election of Mansfield's congressional candidate extremely difficult.

At noon one day in October Cathewe came down for his breakfast, a frown between his eyes.

"What is it, sonny?" asked his mother.

"What is what?"

"The meaning of that frown."

"Oh, well, I had a curious experience at the office last night. I heard an ahem and looked up. Bang! went a flashlight; and before I could recover from my astonishment, the photographer had vanished. Took a picture of me—stole it. But I can't let that worry me. I must get that new book done. Our funds are getting low."

Shortly after, he entered his study and closed the door. She saw no more of him until four, when he signified that he was off for a walk in the hills.

He had not been gone more than twenty minutes when Nancy's smart runabout stopped at the curb. Two or three times a week she carried Mrs. Cathewe off for a ride in the country.

At the same hour today father's chariot of mercy rolled under the Mansfield porte cochere. But more of that anon.

Mrs. Cathewe had to change, so for a few moments Nancy was left to her own devices. She saw the study door wide open and stepped across the threshold. Books were scattered over the floor, the air filled with the strong scent of tobacco, a desk littered with paper, a wicker basket filled to the brim with closely written sheets, a waste basket choked with crumpled, discarded efforts.

The one thing that had a touch of orderliness was the stack of blank paper arranged before the empty chair. She could see that something had been written on the top sheet, so she bent to see what it was. A name, repeated many times.

"George Cottar," "George Cottar," repeated perhaps a dozen times.

"George Cottar!" She spoke the name aloud. A pile of manuscript and the name George Cottar! The illumination left her temporarily blinded. The Brushwood Boy—George Cottar—Brandon Cathewe! Why, Brand was the novelist; and hiding his light under the bushel like this! What did that signify?

Impulsively she reached down into the waste basket and picked up one of the crumpled sheets, and smoothed it out. A rejected sheet; he would never miss it. So she folded it and put it in a pocket. Then she stole forth, her eyes shining and her cheeks aflame.

* * * * * * * *

Mansfield had an odd experience—for him—that afternoon. A representative of the local merchants called to ask him to release them from their promise regarding the boycott of the Herald.

"We are sorry, Mr. Mansfield," he announced, "but we can't carry this on any longer. We don't want to offend you or lose the trade of the thousands you employ, but we have come to the conclusion that it would be far more profitable for us to cater to the other seventy-odd thousand and let your people go. What answer shall I carry back?"

"That they are under no further obligations," answered Mansfield quietly.

"Our thanks, Mr. Mansfield. We shall renew our contracts with the Herald at once."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Tribute Seems Rough on Wedding Finery

Rice and confetti, for use after wedding ceremonies, both have their opponents, but they seem preferable to the coal dust which, we are told, was thrown at St. Pancras recently after the wedding of a coal heaver and his bride.

But the idea of this occupational tribute is not quite new; some years ago a confectioner and his bride were pelted with the little sweets which are known as "hundreds and thousands." The idea might be endlessly extended—tea leaves for the grocer, sawdust for the joiner, chopped suet for the butcher, buns for the baker, buttons for the draper, orange peel for the greengrocer, and pills for the doctor and chemist. In the case of writing people and journalists, presumably all their friends would turn up and empty their fountain pens at the bride and bridegroom. That sounds a curious compliment—but, then, so does coal dust.—Manchester (England) Guardian Weekly.

Early Use of Gas

The first American house in which gas was used for lighting was the home of David Melville, at Newport, R. I. Baltimore, Md., was the first city in the United States to use gas for lighting. It was introduced there in 1817.

Too Much "Acid?"

Excess Uric Acid Gives Rise to Many Unpleasant Troubles.

AUTHORITIES agree that an excess of uric acid is primarily due to faulty kidney action. Retention of this toxic material often makes its presence felt by sore, painful joints, a tired, languid feeling and, sometimes, toxic backache and headache. That the kidneys are not functioning right is often shown by scanty or burning passage of secretions. Thousands assist their kidneys at such times by the use of Doan's Pills—a stimulant diuretic. Doan's are recommended by many local people. Ask your neighbor!

WHAT THE PHOTOGRAPHS REVEALED

By MARGARET MIDDLETON

(© by W. G. Chapman.)

"I WOULDN'T dream of accepting your half-price offer," said Mrs. Marvin, with all the liberal ingenuousness of a new and happy bride.

"I need work so sorely," explained Roslyn Boyd, "that I am willing to take anything I can get."

He was a gentleman, she saw that. His face showed cultured intelligence.

"You seem to be very anxious," she suggested, in a sympathetic, womanly way, and more than anxious was the reply.

"We are hard pressed, my sick wife and two little children. About all I know is photography. Until recently I had quite a lucrative position, photographing scenery for a railroad company. My work for them was completed some time ago and I have had to pick up what business I can in this way."

"Very well, you can take a photograph of the house—yes, and another of the garden and print up half a dozen of each."

Two days later, when Boyd delivered his order, he departed from his generous almoner well paid and with the promise of more work. Within the week Mrs. Marvin sent him to half a dozen wealthy friends. Then she called at the humble home of the photographer in her limousine, brought dainties for his invalid wife, provided for the children and scattered sunshine generally in the Boyd household.

Of course, Boyd was deeply grateful. Whenever he met Mrs. Marvin she had a pleasant, encouraging word for him. Her friends helped her to send word to Boyd. He found himself hopeful, prosperous, happy.

One morning as he chanced to pass the elegant home of the Marvins, he viewed a scent that at once troubled him. Mr. Marvin was just leaving the house. He came down the steps with an angry face, evidently greatly disturbed. He was a handsome man, but his features seemed to show traces of dissipation. Pretty Mrs. Marvin stood within the vestibule, one hand extended as if appealing to him to return. Then as her husband swung away she crouched back, covering her face with her hands as if in dire distress.

"Trouble! Oh, I hope not, though it seems so," reflected Boyd, sorely disturbed on account of his good, kind friend. Then his thoughts were abruptly disturbed as a friendly hand touched his shoulder.

"Hello, Boyd, what you doing in this aristocratic quarter?" hailed his challenger, whom he recognized as an old-time friend.

"I am having a good deal of work in the neighborhood," explained Boyd.

"Know the Marvins?"

"Oh, yes, Mrs. Marvin has taken a special interest in influencing commissions for me in her society circle."

"A sweet little lady, that," commented his friend. "Wasn't that her husband who just walked away? A fine fellow, but spoiled. Money, social standing, a charming wife, but fast on the downward path, I fear."

"I had not heard of that," murmured Boyd, very greatly troubled.

"She didn't know the worst and he didn't realize it," went on the other. "So far his weakness is only getting with a lively crowd of old college chums and dissipating. You can infer what that will lead to in time. He has a bout, say once a week, is brought home jolly but boisterous, is all savage and disgruntled the next morning. It's breaking that poor little woman's heart."

All this was a revelation to loyal Roslyn Boyd and he was deeply grieved. Mrs. Marvin called him in a day or two later to see about enlarging some family pictures. He fancied he could trace a repressed sorrow in her manner, the lines of care about her finely-chiseled lips. However, he dared not broach the subject resting weightily on his mind, nor proffer the earnest, helpful sympathy that stirred his honest soul.

"Poor woman! If I could only assist her," was the constant burden of his thoughts. He saw the friend who had advised him of the situation and told him of his gratitude towards Mrs. Marvin, his anxiety to be of service to her.

"You can't break into a family row, you know," he was advised. "You'd get no thanks if you did. It's just this way: if Marvin could be made to know and see the ridiculous figure he makes. He would probably be shocked into behaving himself."

"I've got an idea!" mused Boyd slowly and hopefully, and he proceeded to carry it out. He was an expert photographer, as has been said. There came to him an inspiration to use his art to produce a salutary impression upon the reckless Marvin.

After that for nearly two weeks Marvin had a shadow without suspecting it. Secretly but diligently Boyd followed him through two of his reckless "bouts with the boys." It was the morning after the last of these escapades that Boyd appeared in his private office.

"Mr. Marvin," he said, as they were alone, "I have called to show you some photographs."

Marvin had met him several times and was civil enough, but evidently bored. The effects of his previous night's debauch had unnerved him. He was unhinged, probably ashamed, possibly repentent.

"The pictures comprise a series," went on Boyd. "They cover the doings of a man I deeply esteem, but who has fallen upon evil ways. I hope you will be patient while I exhibit them, and then tell you how and why they were taken."

Marvin regarded his visitor with slight suspicion. He gave a violent start and flushed deeply as he glanced at the first of the pictures Boyd handed him.

Then he forgot rancor and resentment at this overt invasion of his strictly personal affairs.

He was the center of all the photographs shown. In the first he was depicted with men, some of whom he would not even have recognized in his right senses.

The second showed him leaning from an automobile, a senselessly silly expression on his face, throwing coins to a hideous, jeering mob following the machine.

In a third he was being held up by two others while he made a speech to a grinning crowd at a street corner. Another showed him clinging to a lamp-post, helpless. So down the line, a truthful delineation of a tippler's progress.

"I suppose," he observed, looking up finally in a chagrined, shame-faced way, "that you wish to sell me these photographs to get them out of the way?" plainly intimating a suspicion of blackmail.

For reply Boyd seized the package, tore the cards to fragments and threw them into a waste basket.

"No, Mr. Marvin," he said, "I only wished to bring home to you what the dear, loyal wife who loves you so truly might feel, if she ever saw you as you have been. Oh! sir—"

"You need not go on!" cried Marvin poignantly, springing to his feet. He had seized the hand of his visitor fervently. His eyes were filled with tears.

"Never again!" he said. "First shame, remorse, then confession. I am going home to tell my wife that she need sit up no more fearing the unsteady step that has terrified her in the past. Heaven bless you for a true, honest friend!"

It was a happy-faced Mrs. Marvin who called at the Boyd home the next day, a hopeful-hearted, fervently grateful woman. Tearfully she told Mrs. Boyd of what her husband had done. Then, facing the noble, embarrassed fellow, she threw her arms around his neck and kissed him—as might a dear, dear sister.

Possible to Insure Almost Anything Now

Some motion-picture theaters are issuing cards to their patrons stating that they may "laugh their head off, for they are insured." The management has purchased a form of policy which reimburses it in case of medical attention for anyone suffering from hysteria as a result of laughing at the film.

This is only one of the many queer "risks" now covered by insurance. A father of twin daughters, fearing they might be kidnaped, obtained a burglary and theft policy on them which remained in effect several years and was canceled when the twins grew up. Insurance against the arrival of twins has been frequent to indemnify parents for any financial setback. A driver of Eskimo dogs obtained a policy to protect him against claims that might be set up by persons bitten. Marine companies insure all sorts of articles. A gambler insured his gold and diamond dental work against hold-up and theft and inventors obtained a policy on an ingenious model of the Holy city to reimburse them in case their valued possession was damaged by fire, shipping, or was stolen. A young woman journeying to this country from Europe to officiate as a judge at a conference of perfume manufacturers, had her nose insured against any accidental damage that might be suffered before the contest, impairing her efficiency.—Popular Mechanics Magazine.

Spices Not Harmful

Few items are more essential than spices to the well being and comfort of our people. Many things would not be used as food if they were not made palatable by the use of spices and flavoring extracts. While perfectly good and wholesome themselves some foods are not appetizing and would not be relished unless flavored.

The idea that spices are unhealthy or cause certain troubles has been proved to be unfounded. On the contrary, spices are largely instrumental in increasing appetite and aiding digestion, and are known to be very wholesome and necessary with our daily food. In Mexico and other spice producing countries, where the natives use large quantities of spices in nearly all their foods, people live as long as Americans, if not longer.—Tea and Coffee Trade Journal.

Mighty City of London

Residents of London, as well as visitors, are quite unequal to visualizing that 8,000,000 persons dwell in Greater London. This is 2,000,000 more than the vast continent of Australia and only 1,500,000 fewer than the population of Canada. There are 11,000 persons to the square mile in London, compared with less than two in Australia, says the Vancouver Province. Based upon their taxable value, the buildings of London are worth $300,000,000 and it would require the whole lifetime of several persons merely to look at them. Greater London has 2,300 miles of streets and their upkeep costs $15,000,000 a year.

Modern Girl Knows All About Gasoline

The night was black, the road unfrequented so early in the morning. Suddenly the motor gave some convulsive sobs and the car stopped. Bill, much perturbed, made an earnest effort to start the engine but failed. After getting out and looking over the engine, he turned to Betty and said:

"This is sad. The gasoline tank seems to be full of water and we can't move a foot."

Betty was far less perturbed. She replied:

"Come on inside and stop looking worried. This has happened to me before. All we have to do is to sit in the car for about an hour and the water turns right back into gasoline."—Los Angeles Times.

MARKET DAY OCTOBER 15

Enjoyed Auto Trip

Mr. and Mrs. Arno Steinhauer and family returned home last Thursday from Duluth, where they attended the wedding of the former's niece, Miss Gertrude Palaski on Wednesday Sept. 28. They also visited with three of Mr. Steinhauer's sisters, Mrs. Joe Palaski, Mrs. R. Hoad, and Mrs. Carl Christoferson and their families. While in Duluth and on their way home through towns on the iron range they saw some wonderful sights. They enjoyed the trip very much in their now Overland Whippet ar.

Nettie Borsheim and Myrtle Soiney took care of their place while they were gone.

P. L. Anderson and S. E. Reierson attended a buttermakers meeting at Thief River Falls on Wednesday evening.

Quite a number of people from here motored to Thief River on Monday evening to hear Governor Christianson speak.

The entire school faculty went to Crookston Wednesday where they will spend a few days attending a teachers convention.

"North of 36"

The journey of Columbus across the Atlantic in 1492 required no more courage than the trip made by the pioneers of the south in their attempt to establish a definate trail between Texas and the railroads in Kansas.

The first caravan traveling from the Gulf of Mexico to the northern United States faced fearful odds—Indians, Carpetbaggers, floods, fire, wild animals, and more obstacles described in Emerson Hough's historical novel, "North of 36," which Irvin Willat produced in picture form for Paramount.

Prominent in the cast of this picture are Jack Holt, Lois Wilson, the "Covered Wagon girl, and Noah Beery.

Bird Champion Sprinter

The speed of the pheasant is computed to be in the neighborhood of 15 or 18 miles an hour. When the college sprinter runs the 100-yard dash in ten seconds, he exceeds but slightly the time the bird makes in the much shorter runs. Considering that the stride of the average good sprinter is about eight feet or nearly eleven times that of the bird, the pheasant's performance stands as remarkable.—Detroit News.

Northwest Station Corn Popular

A strain of Northwestern Dent developed at the Northwest Experiment Station, Crookston, has been ordered in quantity this year for Argentine after trials made in 1924 by their Dept. of Agriculture. A leading seedsman in England has ordered a ton for use in that country. A large quantity was shipped to Michigan last year and distributed by the Michigan State Seed Department. Nearly a carload was ordered for Saskatchewan by the Deputy Commissioner of Agriculture.

This early strain of Northwestern Dent was developed by selection after an ear-to-row test at the Northwest Station. It has an average yeild of 49 bushels per acre of field dry corn.

STILL YOUNG

We beleive that electricity is the outstanding development of the universe. How many of us stop to think that this great commercial servant has been developed for man's use, for the most part, in the last fifty years.

This progress then is not an inheritance, aside from early experiments, and a majority of the men responsible for present day efficiencies in its manufacture and distribution are still living.

Present day availability of this most useful servant has been made possible by private enterprise, corporations for the most part. Combined effort and untiring application has given to mankind a necessity that the world couldn't get along without in present day life.

As he went out he passed Doctor Maddox coming in.

"John," Mansfield said, "I sent for you because I wish to ask an honest man a few simple questions."

Maddox, plainly distressed, pulled his beard. "What's happened to you?"

"An inconceivable thing. I've fallen in love with something."

"What?"

"My daughter."

"Nothing abnormal about that. Tell me what you want to, and I'll answer as an honest friend."

"What do you know about this fellow Brandon Cathewe?"

"I know him to be as clean and white as a hound's tooth, Dunleigh. I'm glad you've fallen in love with Betty. It's bound to change your point of view. You've made Bannister prosperous, but on a rotten foundation. You have set out to break Cathewe because he is the first man who ever dared oppose you openly. And I don't believe you will succeed."

"Why?"

"Because he represents Right and you represent Might."

"That's plain speaking, John."

"You asked for it."

"All this is quite complimentary to me," said Mansfield, dryly. "Then you advise me to throw up my hands? John, my position is impregnable."

"On the money side, yes. Man, there's a great thing under your hand. Make a clean breast of it to that girl."

Mansfield drew his palm across his forehead. "First, I've got to find out where Cathewe got his four hundred thousand. Did you know that he had that amount in the local banks?"

"No."

"Do you accept him in your house as an equal?"

"Assuredly!"

"By George, that fellow has hypnotized you!"

"Not noticeably."

"So you have written down your boyhood friend as a rogue!"

"I won't answer that. I'll abide by what you have written down yourself" —shrewdly.

Mansfield laughed. "I'll travel on my own. But you won't find anything you'd call mean in the deal. I can promise you that. But one of us must break."

"I'm on the boy's side, Dunleigh," replied Maddox, getting up. "But I'll repeat my advice: Call up Cathewe; give him what he wants." Then the doctor [illegible]

That night as he sat before the fire in the library, his office hours over, his pipe going comfortably, Nancy walked over and sat down in his lap, took the pipe from his teeth, and laid it on the ashtray. Then she seized his ears and drew his head right about face.

"Father Maddox, who is Digby Hallowell?"

His start nearly upset her. "Where did you hear that name?"

"From you."

"From me? But that's impossible!"

"Don't you know that you have lately acquired the habit of muttering out loud when you are overtired? Half a dozen times I have heard you mutter that name as if it were some tremendous thing."

"Nancy," he said, gravely, "you will do father a great favor if you will forget you ever heard me utter it. I feel, by uttering that name aloud, even unconsciously, that I have broken my faith as a physician.

* * * * * * *

When the advertising men of the various shops penitently entered the business office of the Herald the next morning, asking to renew their contracts, the business manager called up Cathewe, who had an extension telephone at the side of his bed. Drowsily Cathewe caught the first few words, then he became wide awake.

"All of them?"

"Yes, sir. They want their spaces back tomorrow."

"The old contracts are dead."

"I've got new ones all ready, with the cash line blank. Do you want to come down, or shall I handle it?"

"I'll leave it to you. But listen carefully. The Herald has gained twenty thousand since those chaps deserted us. Add twenty per cent to the old scale."

"Wouldn't it be better to soak them with the January renewal?"

"You don't understand the big thing that's happened. Those fellows are not in the office because they are sorry for us. They are up against a wall, and we're the only way out. Twenty per cent and a year's run. When a man offers you a Corona, you don't ask for a stogie. Those are the terms. They can take them or leave them. Call me up when they go." Cathewe propped himself with his pillows and stared at the telephone for a full half hour; and when the telephone finally rang again, the hair on his forehead was damp. "Well?" he said.

"Not a whimper. One year, with a twenty per cent raise, and they seemed glad to sign. In a couple of months—if the print-paper holds out—we'll be carrying money to the banks."

"I'll be with you at four."

Cathewe set the telephone down with a bang, kicked the bedclothes high into the air, turned a somersault and landed with a thud on the floor. He picked himself up, laughing, flung his bathrobe across his shoulders, and dashed down the hall to the bathroom. It was only after nine, but that did not matter.

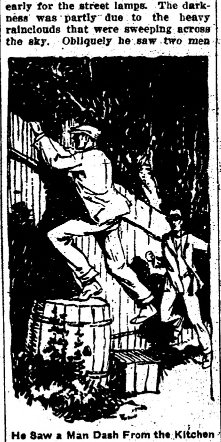
"I've won mother," he said, as he came storming into the dining room, his eyes glistening and his fine skin ruddy.

"Think of it! The most puzzling, tantalizing, quicksilvery thing on earth—the public—went out and won this fight for me because they saw I was playing fair!

"Queer sheep that they are, they would turn against me tomorrow, if they knew! Mother, I'm being watched. I can't prove it, but I sense it continually. Mansfield has just received a bitter blow to his prestige. He's not going to leave any stone unturned to do me injury."

He ate his breakfast hurriedly, then bolted into the study. For a little while she could hear him humming some bars from the "Second Polonaise"; then silence. Thereafter she and the maid moved about their work without sound. He wrote steadily until three, on his book; then he went to the office. He worked hard, arranged a new advertising schedule with his business manager and left the office at five o'clock. It was growing dark. He always walked home, even in bad weather.

It was dark, but still a little too early for the street lamps. The darkness was partly due to the heavy rainclouds that were sweeping across the sky. Obliquely he saw two men across the street apparently talking to a woman. What made him turn his head and look squarely, he never knew. Ordinarily, he would have continued on. This single look was enough. He broke into a run. When he arrived he did not ask questions. He knocked one of the men flat and whirled the other into the gutter.



He Saw a Man Dash From the Kitchen and Make for the Back Fence.

"Can I be of assistance?" he said, turning to the woman. Then he saw who it was. "Miss Mansfield! What in the world are you doing alone in this quarter of the town? Here, take my arm. My home is only a few blocks away. I'll call a taxi and you can have a cup of tea while you wait."

"If you please! I . . . . I'm rather upset. One of them touched me!" Cathewe stopped. "No, no! Please do not go back. My chauffeur must have misunderstood my directions, for I left him by the curb here."

"I'm so glad I happened along."

"So am [illegible]"

And they started on, but neither could think of anything else to say.

"Here we are," he said, when they at last reached the house.

"Is that you, sonny?"

What a pleasant voice! thought the girl, her astonishment at full tide.

"Yes, mother. Will you ring for lights and tea? I have company—Miss Mansfield, whose chauffeur misunderstood her instructions."

The girl heard a flurry of skirts in the room beyond, the tinkle of a bell, and then in a kind of dream Betty entered the living-room.

"Can you see the lounge?" he asked.

"Yes."

Almost at once the maid came in with a Roman candelabrum, which she placed on the piano.

"You'll excuse me a moment," said Cathewe, "while I call a taxi"; and he stepped into the hall.

Mrs. Cathewe sat down again and played Greig's "Papillon," played it without taking her gaze off this flowerlike young woman; and Betty felt powerless to shift her eyes. She had entered an enchanted castle, and the mystic inhabitants had laid a spell upon her. She was not conscious of moving. Did she drink a cup of tea? She could not remember. She recollected nothing until the door of the taxicab slammed behind her.

Betty peered from the side window, and received a distinct shock. Why, this Ali Baba's cave was almost opposite Nancy's! Nancy knew them. She must know them!

The moment she arrived home she was astonished to note that it was seven. She had been in that quaint house almost two hours. She ran to the telephone and called a number.

"Doctor Maddox, please." She had to wait a minute.

"Hello!"

"This is Betty Mansfield, doctor. I've a question to ask. Who lives in that little white house across the street from you, the house with the picket fence?"

"There are four or five white houses across the street."

"Thanks!" With an indignant gesture she set the receiver on the hook.

Cathewe usually remained at his desk until the paper was ready for the press, which was about three o'clock in the morning. But tonight at twelve he turned the office over to the night editor. He wanted to get out of doors, walk. His head was full of the girl. He could not dismiss the vivid picture of her.

Cathewe's long stride carried him to his own gate. He was in the act of opening it when a pistol shot cut through the silence sharply.

CHAPTER VI

Longing.

Cathewe broke into a run toward the rear of the house. He saw a man dash from the kitchen and make for the back fence. There was no way of cutting him off, but there was a chance of putting a hand on him before he could scale the high board fence. Cathewe touched the man's coat tail, but futilely.

"Mother?" he called, thundering through the kitchen into the dining room. "Mother?"

"Yes, sonny! I'm all right," came from his study. "I fired only to frighten him. He was rifling your safe. Was there anything of value there?"

"Only odds and ends of manuscripts and my dramatic contracts. This is Mansfield. That money in the bank is bothering him. He begins to feel that he must find out. But I must go to New York tomorrow night, even if I'm followed."

"There goes the bell!" exclaimed Mrs. Cathewe.

"Probably the patrolman."

It was. Cathewe offered him a cup of coffee, and the three of them sat around the kitchen table, discussing the affair.

Then Mrs. Cathewe described the man minutely.

"I'd let the matter drop," the patrolman said suddenly.

"Clary, which are you for?" Cathewe demanded.

"What do you mean?"

"Are you for Mansfield or for Bannister?"

"Bannister, Mr. Cathewe. But for all that, my job is my bread and butter. You know the department as well as I do. You're up against a real war. You'll never get anything on Mansfield that'll hold water in court."

Cathewe let the matter drop, and the policeman left.

At precisely this moment the telephone rang in Mansfield's library. Mansfield laid aside his book.

"Hello!"

"This Mr. Mansfield?"

"Yes."

"There wasn't anything."

Mansfield hung up the receiver, but he did not reach for the book he had been reading. Instead, he stared into space.

He was thinking and thinking hard. The truth is, he was trying to fight his way through the gossamer net Betty had thrown about him. He sensed with panic that the fiber which had made him a power in the land was softening.

Again, his imagination took another turn. He seemed to be walking in a valley of echoes. "Give Betty what she wants." "Give me what I want." "Give Cathewe what he wants." "Give."

The thought of Cathewe, however, always had the effect of a tonic upon a man at low ebb. To crush this meddling whippersnapper, break him and scatter him like dust.

The sum of all these psychological incursions and cogitations was this: Mansfield was giving Betty what she wanted, giving it to her because he loved her and because another phrase of Maddox' was of recurrent quality.

Moved by Conscience to Make Restitution

The American treasury derives a certain amount of pin-money from restitutions made by persons who are troubled by the prickings of conscience. In one year the amount received from this source exceeded $5,000. Among the contributors to this fund are taxpayers who have minimized their incomes, importers who have evaded customs duties, letter-writers who have used stamps that have done service before but had not been defaced, government clerks who have exaggerated their expense accounts, and old soldiers who wish to make amends for a saddle blanket stolen long ago.

One of the most curious recent examples of penitence was that of a Washington woman who was "in desperate need" of a story which could be procured only from a newspaper in the files of the Library of Congress. It was several columns long, and she felt unequal to the labor of coypling it, so she took the paper away with her. Thereafter her conscience gave her no rest until she sent four cents in payment of her debt.—Manchester (England) Guardian.

THROUGH A WOMAN'S EYES

On Idleness and Freedom

A complaint of many busy people today is that the demands of their work are so great that they are never free of it, that there is always something undone ahead of them.

And yet if we observe these people, we find that they get the most peace and contentment out of life. They are occupied constructively and every day brings them the satisfaction of accomplishment. They are building —and whether it is a mother who is occupied with her children or a man who is founding and building a business, each year shows the result of their labors in improvement and growth, than which there is nothing more satisfying or more conducive to satisfaction and happiness.

It is those who have nothing to do or not enough to do who are always dissatisfied. With those who have never been busy, with whom idling is an occupation, time is the cross they must bear, how to "kill" it the bane of their existence. Of all the burdens that the worker must carry there is none so heavy as the time that hangs on the hands of the idler.

But the people who are the most convincing answer to those of us who resent having "something undone always ahead of us," are those who were busy workers and have at last achieved their ambition to be free of routine and have plenty of leisure to do the things they would like to do.

It is the same with every one of them. For a short time they enjoy their new "freedom." They go from one to another of the diversions and pleasures they had never had time to enjoy, "taking in" everything, the lack of which had ever caused them to be dissatisfied with their lot. But hardly have they run the gamut when it all begins to pall and they find the weight of time on their hands heavier than any work they had ever to do. Witness the number of men who "retire" and before the year is out are back in business.

This reminds me, too, of the answer I heard one young mother give to another who envied her for having had three years of "freedom" before being "tied down" with a baby.

"The only thing you have to envy me for," she said, "is that having experienced such freedom I realize that I am missing nothing by being 'tied down.'"

The girl who soon after her marriage was faced with the responsibility and work entailed by a baby thought of all the pleasures of which she had been deprived. But the one who had the opportunity to enjoy them realized how little she was missing.

The Woman Who Makes People Edge Away From Her

It was in the day coach of a train on the way to Boston. They were sitting across the aisle from me—obviously, as the cynic would say, husband and wife. The point is that he was edging away from her.

There was plenty of room on the seat for them both to be comfortable, for they were both thin. But there he was edging away from her until it seemed he must fall off the seat. And she was following him over.

I wondered whether she could be jabbing pins into him—but she was only talking. I did not hear what she was saying to him. Apparently it was not terribly abusive—it appeared that they had settled their argument and that she just couldn't let up. And, it seemed to be this rather than what she was saying to him that was wearing into the man's bones and sending him as far away from her as he could get.

There are women like that—women who are wearing. That's it—just wearing—so that you want to edge away from them almost, if necessary, to the brink of a precipice.

Life with them is a constant process of attrition—you feel as though they were going to get you to the wall and then smother you.

Why do they do it? Is it nervousness or an exaggerated sense of thoroughness—or what? It is just as wearing on them as on the people with whom they live. And it is such a pity because it is so utterly a waste.

If that woman on the train had taken what was on her mind, said what she had to say and then been through with it she would have been efficient.

After all in any argument it's what we have to say that counts and the shorter we can make it the stronger it is likely to be. But to keep at it—nagging—wearing—even after it is settled.

What's the use? It doesn't get us anything but assurance of a big wide space around us as long as there is any place to which the other person can run.

Few Snakes in North

Snakes are extremely sensitive to cold. Many common North American snakes do not range much farther north than the Canadian border. Others stay south of the Ohio river. The range of the garter snake is known to extend northward to the region around Great Slave lake, and there are records of the appearance of this snake from the Yukon region. This snake has an exceptionally wide range.

FEELING LOTS BETTER NOW

Writes Ethel May Snider Who Used Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Hartford City, Ind.—Doing housework and taking care of a sick woman proved to be too much for Ethel May Snider, R. R. 1 of Hartford City, until she started taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Overwork had so undermined her health that she had to give up all outside work, and when she saw this medicine advertised in the "Star" and other papers, she went to druggist and got a bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. She took it regularly, was greatly benefited and now feels very much better.

Ethel May Snider's experience is similar to that of thousands of other women in all walks of life, who have sent testimonials to the Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Company of Lynn, Mass.

Among those who praise the Compound are young girls who have been enabled to attend school regularly —working girls who have gained strength and endurance so necessary to them, housewives and mothers who have found that the tonic-effect of the Compound has enabled them to perform their daily tasks more easily.

Mesmerism Does Away With Pain

The theory of suggestion has recently cropped up in quite a new form. It is now claimed that the pain of dental extractions can be allayed by mesmerism.

The method used in this peculiar form of painless dentistry is to place the patient in a chair and put before him an optician's test card. The sufferer is invited to gaze steadily at a particular letter on the card, after which he must close his eyes and try to fix in his mind a picture of the letter.

After several attempts he will be able to do this satisfactorily and actually hold both color and outline in his brain to the exclusion of other thoughts and feelings. When this state of complete mental subjection has been reached it is possible for the dentist to introduce the forceps without fear of causing pain.

Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the State of Minnesota

Submitted by the Legislature at its General Session, 1925, to the People of Minnesota at the General 1926 Election Together with Statements of

Purpose and Effect of each

Prepared by
CLIFFORD L. HILTON
Attorney-General of Minnesota.

Addressed to
MIKE HOLM
Secretary of State.

ST. PAUL, MINNESOTA,
OFFICE OF ATTORNEY GENERAL,
March 30, 1926.

HONORABLE MIKE HOLM,
Secretary of State,

In compliance with the provisions of section 46, General Statutes 1923, I furnish you herewith a statement of the purpose and effect of proposed amendments to the Constitution of the State of Minnesota which are to be submitted to the electors of the state at the general election in 1926, in accordance with certain acts adopted by the legislature at the 1925 session thereof.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 1

By the adoption of chapter 428, Laws 1925, the legislature has proposed an amendment to section 2, article 6, of the constitution, relating to the supreme court. This section now reads as follows:

"Section 2. The supreme court shall consist of one chief justice and two associate justices, but the number of associate justices may be increased to a number not exceeding four, by the legislature, by a two-thirds vote, when it shall be deemed necessary. It shall have original jurisdiction in such remedial cases as may be prescribed by law, and appellate jurisdiction in all cases, both in law and equity, but there shall be no trial by jury in said court. It shall hold one or more terms in each year, as the legislature may direct, at the seat of government, and the legislature may provide, by a two-thirds vote, that one term in each year shall be held in each or any judicial district. It shall be the duty of such court to appoint a reporter of its decisions. There shall be chosen, by the qualified electors of the state, one clerk of the supreme court, who shall hold his office for the term of four years, and until his successor is duly elected and qualified; and the judges of the supreme court, or a majority of them, shall have the power to fill any vacancy in the office of clerk of the supreme court until an election can be regularly had."

Pursuant to the authority granted by this section the legislature of 1881 increased the number of associate justices to four.

If amended as proposed, this section will read as follows:

"Section 2. The supreme court shall consist of one chief justice and six associate justices. It shall have original jurisdiction in such remedial cases as may be prescribed by law, and appellate jurisdiction in all cases, both in law and equity, but there shall be no trial by jury in said court. It shall hold one or more terms in each year, as the legislature may direct, at the seat of government, and the legislature may provide, by a two-thirds vote, that one term in each year shall be held in each or any judicial district. It shall be the duty of such court to appoint a reporter of its decisions. There shall be chosen, by the qualified electors of the state, one clerk of the supreme court, who shall hold his office for the term of four years, and until his successor is duly elected and qualified; and the judges of the supreme court, or a majority of them, shall have the power to fill any vacancy in the office of clerk of the supreme court until an election can be regularly had."

The Purpose of the Proposed Amendment:

The supreme court, as now organized under the constitution, consists of a chief justice and four associate justices, all elected by the people. In 1913, in order to take care of the increasing business of the court, the legislature passed a law providing for the appointment of two commissioners to assist the court in the performance of its duties. The act under which these commissioners are appointed provides that each shall receive the same compensation as a justice of the supreme court, and also provides that if, by amendment to the constitution, the number of associate justices shall be increased to six, the office of commissioner shall be abolished.

In practice the commissioners sit as members of the court, hear arguments, read briefs, take part in discussions, write opinions, and in general do the same work as the regular justices, but they have no vote in determining the final decisions of the court. The legislature cannot give the commissioners a voice in the decisions of the court, since the organization of the court is governed by the constitution.

The purpose of the proposed amendment is to provide for the election of two or more associate justices with full authority as members of the court, to take the place of the present two commissioners, who will then cease to hold office.

The Effect of the Proposed Amendment:

The effect of the proposed amendment, if adopted, will be to provide for the election of two more associate justices of the supreme court with full authority as members of the court, replacing the present two commissioners, without additional expense.

The ballot used at the election should have printed thereon the following:

NOTE: "On first proposition, if in favor of the election of two associate justices to take the place of the two appointed court commissioners, vote Yes: if opposed, vote No.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 2

By the adoption of chapter 427, Laws 1925, the legislature has proposed that the constitution be amended by the adoption of a new article, to be appropriately numbered and to read as follows:

ARTICLE—

Section 1. Laws may be enacted for the purpose of encouraging and promoting forestation and reforestation of lands in this state, whether owned by private persons or the public, including the fixing in advance of a definite and limited annual tax on such lands for a term of years and a yield tax at or after the end of such term upon the timber and other forest products so grown, but the taxation of mineral deposits shall not be affected by this amendment.

Section 2. Any and all provisions of the constitution of the State of Minnesota, inconsistent with the provisions of this article, are hereby repealed, so far, but only so far, as the same prohibit or limit the power of the legislature to enact laws authorizing or permitting the doing of the things hereinbefore authorized.

THE PURPOSE OF THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT:

The purpose of the proposed amendment is to confer upon the legislature express authority to enact laws encouraging and promoting forestation and reforestation of public lands and lands privately owned in this state, including the fixing in advance of a definite and limited annual tax on such lands for a term of years, and a yield tax at or after the end of such term, upon the timber and other forest products grown upon such lands.

THE EFFECT OF THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT:

The effect of the proposed amendment, if adopted, will be to authorize legislation providing for setting aside a part of the lands owned by the state for the purpose of forestation and reforestation; and permitting privately owned lands to be so set aside by act of the owner thereof, and, by way of encouragement, permitting the taxation of such lands and the timber and other forest products thereof on a special basis, which need not be uniform with the basis of taxation of other lands in the state.

The ballot used at the election should have printed thereon the following:

SECOND—
FORESTATION AND REFORESTATION OF LANDS

Amendment to the constitution of Minnesota by adding thereto a new article, to be appropriately numbered, in the order of its adoption, authorizing the enactment of laws encouraging and promoting forestation and reforestation of lands in this state, whether owned by private persons or the public, including the fixing in advance of a definite and limited annual tax on such lands for a term of years and a yield tax at or after the end of such term upon the timber and other forest products so grown, but the taxation of mineral deposits shall not be affected by this amendment.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 3

By the adoption of chapter 429, Laws 1925, the legislature has proposed an amendment to section 3, article 10, of the constitution, relating to corporations. This section now reads as follows:

"Section 3. Each stockholder in any corporation, excepting those organized for the purpose of carrying on any kind of manufacturing or mechanical business, shall be liable to the amount of stock held or owned by him."

If amended as proposed, this section will read as follows:

"Section 3. The legislature shall have power from time to time to provide for, limit and otherwise regulate the liability of stockholders or members of corporations and co-operative corporations or associations, however organized."

THE PURPOSE OF THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT:

The constitution, as it now stands, makes each stockholder in any corporation, excepting those organized for the purpose of carrying on a manufacturing or mechanical business, liable for the debts of the corporation, if the corporate assets are insufficient to pay the debts, up to an amount equal to the par value of his stock, in addition to what was paid or should have been paid for the stock when issued.

The purpose of the proposed amendment is to authorize the legislature to prescribe and regulate by law the liability of stockholders in all corporations, including co-operative corporations or associations, however organized.

THE EFFECT OF THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT:

The effect of the proposed amendment, if adopted, will be to abrogate the present fixed rule of stockholders' liability prescribed by the constitution and to place the matter of prescribing and regulating the liability of stockholders in all corporations created under the laws of the state entirely within the control of the legislature, subject to change from time to time as they may see fit.

The ballot used at the election should have printed thereon the following:

THIRD—
LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS IN CORPORATION

Amendment to Section 3, of Article 10, of the Constitution, authorizing the legislature from time to time to prescribe and limit the liability of stockholders in corporations.

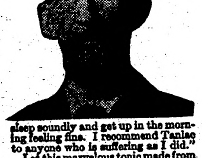
Father of 8 Children Escapes Serious Illness

Suffering From Nervous Prostration, Stomach Troubles, Palpitating Heart, Rochester Man Recovers Lost Health. Thanks Tanlac



The remarkable experience of Peter T. Cummens, 624 E. Center Street, Rochester, Minnesota, is the experience of thousands of men and women who after years of suffering have found grateful relief and new strength in this wonderful tonic.

"For about 10 years I have been troubled a good deal with my stomach," says Mr. Cummens. "And last summer I had to be treated for nervous prostration. But instead of improving this fearful affliction seemed to be getting worse.

"When I forced myself to eat a little to keep body and soul together, dreadful pains from indigestion would torture me. My heart became affected and would palpitate whenever I exerted myself. It caused shortness of breath. I scarcely slept. I would only doze for a few minutes then my muscles would twitch and jerk and I would awaken with a start.

"After hearing so much about Tanlac I decided to try it. A fortunate day! For this wonderful tonic made me feel like a new man. I now enjoy my meals without ill after-effect. I sleep soundly and get up in the morning feeling fine. I recommend Tanlac to anyone who is suffering as I did."

Let this marvelous tonic made from roots, barks and herbs, according to the famous Tanlac formula, rebuild your run-down body. It helps relieve pain and banish poison and restore health to the weak. The first bottle shows amazing results. At druggists. More than 40 million bottles sold.

For Obvious Reasons

Mrs. Bee—Do you find it more economical to do your own cooking?

Mrs. Tee—Oh, yes; my husband doesn't eat half as much as he did.

Playing Safe

"Sir, you contradict yourself."

"Well, you can't say I'm not right!"

A machine to measure the exact color of different kinds of hay has been invented to help local inspectors in the grading of hay.

Runs in Either Case

"Is Gibson a bull or a bear in the stock market?"

"Neither. When he's on the trail of a sure profit he's a bloodhound, and when he's scared he's a rabbit."

Not Often

"Waiter, are you ever surprised at the size of a tip?"

"Yes, sir, but seldom stunned."

After a girl gets married she eats fewer pickles and more fried onions.

ONE THRILL OF WAR

By MARY LYLE WARNER

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman.)

IN THE most critical situation of her young life, Alma Waite gazed longingly at the engagement ring upon her finger and wondered if she would ever see its giver again.

"Where is he, and what is to become of me?" was the constant burden of her thoughts.

A knight errant brave and true, Adrian Bond would have been speedily coming to the rescue of his lady love in distress, but that grim-visaged war had presented its ugly menace and rude clamors shook the commonwealth.

Her father and mother were at Paris. There, too, were the Bonds, making the European trip with their closest friends. It was a strange circumstance that had taken Alma away from them. It appeared that a half-brother of Mrs. Waite lived in a little town in Belgium, near the German border. He had invited the family to pay him a visit, but their plans would not admit it. Then he expressed a wish to see Alma, who had been named after his dead wife. He was fervent in his appeal and half-minded to give up his business and return to America, he said. The result was that Alma took a quick trip from Paris and found herself an honored guest in the splendid but lonely home of her half-uncle.

Zephern Dacre was a diamond merchant, conducting his business by traveling from country to country. Alma was enchanted with the kindly way in which he treated her. She was to have remained with her relative only three days, but Mr. Dacre made up his mind to close up his business, accompany her to Paris and return with the family to America and take up a permanent residence there.

Directly upon the heels of this came a declaration of war. Mr. Dacre hastened his preparations to get out of the country. He urged Alma to remain indoors, for the community surrounding them was in a wild state of excitement.

The evening before the day set for their departure Mr. Dacre discharged all the servants. Just about dusk he came hurrying into the house in a great state of excitement.

"Why, what is the matter?" questioned Alma anxiously, as she noted his colorless face and trembling frame.

"Listen, my dear," said Mr. Dacre hurriedly. "You must leave here at once if a certain thing happens, and it may happen quickly. The war spirit is abroad. They are suspicious of me because of my business connections with other countries. I was just secretly advised that I am listed as one of the proscribed."

"Oh, uncle, they will do you no harm, surely?"

"They will hamper, perhaps arrest me. I was all ready to leave here in the morning. I fear they will not allow me to do so."

"But why not?"

"Officious, and in some cases corrupt persons will try to prevent me from taking my fortune out of the country. See, Alma," and Dacre drew a little chamois bag from a secret pocket, "the diamonds in this represent the bulk of my fortune. Take it, secrete it. If I am arrested fly at once—not into Germany, as we proposed, for that course is blocked, but straight for Paris."

"But, uncle—"

"Quick! they are here already, as I feared," cried Mr. Dacre.

His worst apprehensions were confirmed. There was a loud summons from the end of a musket at the street door.

"Do not lose your nerve, dear child," spoke Dacre. "They dare not harm me and I will soon join you in Paris. Hurry away through the rear garden, take the first train for the border. At all hazards protect the fortune with which I have entrusted you."

Then he was gone to answer the imperious summons at the street door. Alma lingered only long enough to learn that he was really taken in charge as a suspect. Then she filled her handbag, secured the jewels in a safe pocket and hurried away through the garden apparently unobserved.

Alma reached the train. She tried not to think that she was cowardly in deserting a relative in trouble. She felt relieved when the train started. Then she stared in wonder and even suspicion at the other occupant of the carriage. There sat a person who until the day previous had been a servant, a sort of major domo in the service of her uncle. He lifted his cap with a servile smirk on his face Alma did not at all like.

"The master is in trouble," he remarked. "I have heard of it. I, too, may be proscribed and I am bound for another country. If madamoiselle will allow, I will do what I can to see her safely across the border."

Alma murmured her thanks. She did not like the man. She was suspicious of his ready presence. She fancied her uncle had said something about his being untrustworthy. An unprotected young girl, however, she reflected that because of his former employer Boyard might strive to really serve her.

There was no stoppage to the train during the long night. Alma did not sleep. She felt uncomfortably conscious somehow of the constant glance Boyard kept upon her. Was it possible that he knew of the rich treasure she carried?

Just at daybreak the train was halted at a little town in the mountains. A body of soldiers ordered all to alight; Boyard was carrying the little satchel belonging to Alma. Suddenly he disappeared. He did not return. Then Alma was persuaded that he had made away with it, believing its contents valuable. Her passport was gone. She was ordered to remain in the country.

What a fate for the delicate young girl, when that evening, distraught, footsore, affrighted, she neared the light of a lonely hut in the mountains. She dared not remain in the town where the prejudice against an alien would pursue her. She feared being imprisoned, searched, and the jewels taken from her, so she had wandered away from human habitations, blindly hoping some chance might put her across the border.

Once she believed she was pursued, and in the distance fancied she noted the lurking Boyard. Now, hungry, athirst, exhausted, she hastened toward the light. As she neared it a cry of acute pain came from the hut. A wild figure of a man dashed by her. The cry from the hut was repeated. Alma entered to find a peasant woman lying in bed in a spasm of pain.

Then she aroused to minister to the sufferer. It was her keen womanly sympathy that helped her successfully. The man, who had hastened for a neighbor and found no one at home, came back frantic. When he learned, however, of the timely aid of Alma he overwhelmed her with his sincere gratitude.

That night there was a dread alarm at the lonely hut. Half a dozen armed men appeared outside and demanded that Alma be handed over to them as a prisoner. When Alma recognized Boyard as their leader she knew that he was after the diamonds.

She had learned during the evening that her host was a smuggler of laces over the border of France, yet in her dire extremity Alma felt that she must trust in him. She told him her story while the group outside were clamoring vociferously for admission. The smuggler's eyes brightened.

"Ah," he said, "you wish to save your jewels from that horde? Then I can help you and show my gratitude for your kindness to my wife. Tell me the Paris address of your friends. The diamonds shall be there within two days."

And then the speaker whistled for a keen-eyed little dog Alma had noticed about the place. He secured the chamois bag about its neck, scrawled a few lines, and inclosed the screed inside of a padded coat he fitted to the dog, and, going to the window, opened it, dropped the intelligent animal in the dewy grass and away it sped.

Boyard soon learned that he had been baffled. Three days later the smuggler managed to get Alma across the border. There was a great reunion when Mr. Dacre arrived to find the gems safe and sound, for the smuggler's dog had carried the treasure safely over the border to trusty friends of his master, who had sent it on to Paris.

Barnum Left Record of Sermon Preached

P. T. Barnum, the circus king, once preached a sermon. On a Sunday morning in the late summer of 1836, the great showman appeared before the congregation of the Rocky Mount Falls Primitive Baptist church located at the falls of the Tar river, just beyond the village of Rocky Mount Mills, N. C. The sermon is authenticated by Barnum in his autobiography. There are two versions of the Barnum sermon. One is that the regular minister failed to appear and Barnum, in camp near the church, took the pulpit rather than see the crowd disappointed. The other version indicates that Barnum preached after the regular pastor had concluded his sermon. Barnum leaves one quotation from his sermon in his autobiography. It says:

"We cannot violate the laws of God with impunity, and He will not keep back the wages of well-doing. Diamonds may glitter on a vicious breast, but the soul's calm sunshine and the heartfelt joy is virtue's prize."—Raleigh News and Observer.

The Outcast

It came to the notice of a traveling man who had happened into a country store in northern Maine that the crackerbox loafers around the stove seemed to be decidedly cool toward one old man who appeared to be of their clique.

"You don't seem to care much for that fellow's society," remarked the traveling man to one of the loafers.

"Nope," was the reply, "we don't. He's always aboastin' about how he ain't done nothin' but loaf ever since 1890."

"Too much of a braggart, eh?"

"Nope, 'tain't thet, but," he added confidentally, "we jes can't stand a feller thet's forever talkin' shop."—Forbes Magazine.

Seeing

I see everything I paint in this world, but everybody does not see alike. To the eye of a miser a guinea is far more beautiful than the sun, and a bag worn with the use of money has more beautiful proportions than a vine filled with grapes. The tree which moves some to tears of joy is in the eyes of others only a green thing which stands in the way. . . . Some scarce see nature at all. . . . You certainly mistake, when you say that the visions of fancy are not to be found in this world. To me this world is all one continued vision.—William Blake.

Vienna Theatergoers Put Shakespeare First

A referendum of the 2,000 yearly subscribers to the State Drama (Burgtheatre) in Vienna, placed Shakespeare in the list of favorites of the serious theater-going public.

The plays voted for the next season were "A Midsummer Night's Dream," "The Merchant of Venice," "Macbeth," "Coriolanus," and "The Taming of the Shrew." Oscar Wilde was returned second, notably with his "Lady Windermere's Fan," while Schiller, Ibsen, Schnitzler, Rostand, Hebbel and Grillparzer follow in the list.

Shakespeare and Wilde between them obtained 1,219 of the 2,000 votes cast.

Cold distributed on the same general principle as heat is an innovation of the newer apartment dwellings in some of the large cities. Instead of installing bulky machinery in individual apartments for iceless refrigeration purposes, one central machine is used in the basement, just as one furnace or boiler is used. From this central plant the individual apartment housewife can control the cold in her iceless refrigerator, turning it on or off as simply as she regulates a radiator.

Break Cake on Bride's Head

It was the custom of the Romans, 2,000 years ago, to break the wedding cake over the head of the bride as she entered her new home. The breaking of the cake was part of a solemn ceremony, and was said to be peculiarly impressive. A similar custom prevails in some sections of Scotland, where a bannock is broken above the head of the young wife as she, for the first time, enters her new home.

A woman will readily believe anything she hears—provided she wants to believe it.

A woman not only wants to be beautiful but she wants to be told that she is.

FOR COUNTY TREASURER

To the Voters of Marshall County:

Having received the nomination for the office of County Treasurer, I come before you again for your consideration at the General Election on November 2, 1926.

As I realize that I am not very well known in some parts of the County, I think it is only fair to let you know who I am, and also my qualifications for the office. I am a graduate from one of the leading business colleges in this part of the country, and for a good many years past I have been bookkeeper and cashier in a large Department store, so I am well acquainted with office work.

I would like to make a personal call on every voter, but owing to the large territory to be covered, this will be impossible. I will therefore have to rely on my old and new friends for their support and for their votes on Election-day, November 2, 1926.

I shall sincerely appreciate whatever you do for me, and if elected I shall do my very best to serve the people and fulfill the duties of the office of County Treasurer carefully and impartially to all.

Respectfully yours.
PETER E. KVIKSTAD.

BRAGGANS
FOR
County Attorney

If you beleive I have made a fairly good County Attorney, I ask for your support

W. O. Braggans, the present County attorney, took office November 1, 1923, to fill the unexpired term of the late John R. Naeseth. He has conducted the affairs of his office with credit to himself and the County and is now a candidate to succeed himself. Mr. Braggans was born November 9th, 1876. He attended the public grade schools at Kingsville, Ohio, until 14 years of age, when he was obliged to leave school and seek work. He did not again attend school until he entered the law department of the University of Minnesota in 1898. Upon leaving the grade schools he worked in the nail mills and glass factories in and around Wheeling, W. Va., and in 1892 came west, settling at Milbank, S. D. He studied law in the office of Thos. L. Souck while working as a stenographer and was licensed to practice law in S. Dak., in 1898. That fall he entered the law department at the University of Minnesota, and graduated therefrom in the same class with Julius J. Olson of Warren and was licensed to practice law in Minnesota in 1900. He immediately entered the employment of the Supreme Court as a stenographer and stayed there until appointed Court Reporter by Judge Grindeland of Warren in 1902, when he came to Warren, where he has since resided. He was married in 1901 to E. Letha McKenzie of Knox City, Mo., and they have three children, a girl now working in a law office in Chicago as a stenographer, and two boys now attending the public schools at Warren. Mr. Braggans is somewhat of a self-made man as indicted from the fact that he did not receive much schooling; he is industrious, capable and if re-elected will do his best to serve the interests of the people of the county.

PAID POLITICAL ADVERTISING
Inserted for, and to be paid for at regular advertising rates by the candidates whose names appear below.
For Representative in the Legislature From Marshall County

To the Voters of Marshall County:—

As it will be impossible for me to call on all of you personally, I take this method of reminding you that, having received the greatest number of votes of any of the candidates for Representative, at the June Primary, I am a candidate for re-election to the office of Representative for Marshall County, and also to thank you all for the splendid support and vote of confidence you gave me at the Primary Election.

If reelected, I pledge myself to devote my best efforts to the interests of my District and the State at large.

I am not asking for your support as the candidate of any Political Party, but, according to the Laws of Minnesota, as the candidate of the People of Marshall County. I believe that a Representative should be elected to represent the whole District instead of a particular Political Party. I believe that, with my experience and my friendship with the older members of the Legislature, I will be able to accomplish more than a new member can.

I stand for a fair deal for all the People, regardless of their business, occupation or political affiliation.

I believe that when the Legislature passes a Law and agrees to pay any institution or municipality certain State Aid, they should keep their promise by appropriating the money to pay it. I believe that the Mothers Pension and the Supplemental School Aid should be paid.

I believe that the Banking Laws of the State should be so amended as to give protection to the depositors; that there should be a sufficient amount taken from the Trunk Highway Fund, each year, to take care of the County Reimbursement Bonds and interest; that there should be such a division of the State School Funds as would give relief to the schools in districts where the taxable property valuation is lowest; that our Co-Operative Laws should remain inviolate so that our Co-operative Creameries, Poultry Associations, and any other Co-operative association, may continue to operate and be protected from the interference of out side interests; that any sound Legislation for the best interests of Agriculture should be enacted into Law.

Again thanking you for your support in the past and assuring you that I will endeavor to merit your support in the future, I remain,

Yours truly,
—F. A. GREEN,
Candidate for Representative for Marshall County, in the 67th Legislative District.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE VOTERS

Having become a candidate for Congress, by action of the voters in the Republican primaries, it seems right and proper that I should tell you what my ideas and purposes are, if elected.

I have very definite views on legislation for the benefit of agriculture. The tariff, to my mind, is to a great etent the controlling factor in making prices. There are four points in the relation of agriculture to the tariff that I am going to work on, if elected.

First—I am going to fight against any attempt to reduce the tariff on butter, flax and the few other farm products on which the present tariff is now both effective and protective.

Second—I am going to fight for an increase in the tariff on some farm products, on which the present tariff is effective, but not high enough to be protective.

Third—I am going to fight to make the tariff operative on wheat, corn and other crops of which we raise an exportable surplus, and on which the tariff is now high enough but not effective, because we produce more within the country than we consume. The remedy to accomplish this, in my opinion, is something along the line proposed in the McNary-Haugen bill.

Fourth—I am going to fight for a reduction of the tariff on some manufactured goods in cases where the present tariff is more than is warranted by the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, and so high as to lend itself to the aid of extortionate prices and the formation of monopolies in trade.

When I think of the legislative problems of agriculture there often comes into my mind the picture of two large office buildings in Washington. One large and well-equipped block is owned and occupied by the American Federation of Labor. The other, still larger and better equipped, is the home of the United States Chamber of Commerce. Labor speaks with a single voice, through the organization quartered in their large and elaborate building. Industry speaks with a single voice, through the organization quartered in their still larger and more elaborate building. Both get almost everything they ask for in legislation.

Agriculture has no large and imposing headquarters in Washington, and what is more important, it does not speak with a single voice, but with many discordant and conflicting voices. When the forces quartered in either one of the two buildings I have mentioned put over something for the benefit of their own organization, some one loses a proportionate amount. You do not need much imagination to know that the one who pays is the farmer. This is how the inequality created by legislation has come about.

Labor and Industry are not intentional "enemies of the farmer." But each is looking out for his own prosperity. When we can put up a fairly united front we shall achieve for the farmers equality with Labor and Industry. It will be my aim to help organize the forces of agriculture. It can be done.

I shall fight for the establishment and construction of the Great Lakes to-the-ocean deep waterways, which would reduce the freight rates on our exportable grain and raise the price on the whole crop in the northwest from six to twelve cents per bushel.

If, on the basis of the above statement, and what you may know of me, you feel that I can best represent the district—one of the main agricultural districts in the United States—in Congress, I want you not only to vote for me yourself, but to carry the message to your neighbors, as I may not be able to reach them all directly.

Yours most sincerely.
C. G. SELVIG.

Minnesota Farm Bureau Federation
Old Capitol Building
St. Paul, Minn.
May 25, 1926

Hon. Knud Wefald
Member of Congress
Washington, D. C.

My dear Mr. Wefald:

Please accept the heartfelt thanks of the members of the Minnesota Farm Bureau Federation for your splendid fight for equality for agriculture in your support of the Haugen bill. To lose in such a battle is not defeat. It will add strength to a just demand of the largest group in American life by centering the attention of all our people on the unjust position Agriculture holds as compared to other groups and indusries.

The next remedy after the farmer has failed to secure equal opportunity under the law is to remove the advantage other groups now have over him by law. It seems a destructive remedy, but Agriculture in America cannot endure under the present condition.

You are entitled to a heaping measure of gratitude from all farmers and all those who have the well-being of Agriculture at heart.

Respectfully,
(Signed) J. F. Reed, President,
St. Paul, Minn.

September 16, 1926.

Mr. Knud Wefald
Hawley, Minn.

Dear Mr. Wefald

As chairman of the legislative committee of the great farm organizations of the corn and grain belt which met in Des Moines last winter, I wish to thank you sincerely for your valuable help in support of the legislation embodied in the McNary-Haugen bills, so-called. I sincerely hope that you will be able to keep up the fight to obtain for agriculture a square deal by national legislation.

Under present conditions, thousands of farmers are being driven into the already congested cities and are obliged for self-preservation to compete for jobs with already underpaid laboring men.

Very sincerely yours,
(Signed) James R. Manahan.

—7—

"If you deceive her, and she finds it out, you will lose her."

But the truth must be kept from her. She must never know that her father was not the demigod she painted him. Of such is the miracle of love.

As for Betty, she felt herself confronted by a singular fact. She was being covertly snubbed: Nancy was snubbing her, the doctor was snubbing her, and others, too. Possessing a healthy pride, Betty dropped the idea of finding out what she craved to know. But she could not dismiss that remarkable pair from her thoughts. Again and again there came an almost irresistible longing to drive into that quiet street, stop at that door and ask for music.

It is supposable that one of the main reasons for the continuance of this odd situation was that Betty was lonely. Her hours were frequently crowded with action; still she was lonely for the companionships such as she had known in France.

Mansfield still kept three or four saddle horses, and frequently now they rode into the country in the early morning. He would never forget one brilliant, frosty morning. They had dismounted at the top of the hill where she had met Cathewe. The brown earth and the rusty boscage and the flashing blue water of the lake evoked in her desire to sing.

When the last glorious note died away, Mansfield asked in an uncertain voice: "What was that?"

"'The Swallow.'"

"What made you want to sing like that?"

"All this"—with a gesture. "To see grandly is to feel grandly! I love to be up high, to see far horizons. I am wild, daddy; they never tamed me."

Immediately an odd thing happened to her mentally. Out of the sunshine and the frosty mists came a clear picture. She saw that beautiful mother, her white hair and her serene face touched magically by candlelight; she heard divine music. She became afire with the craving to hear it again. A most bizarre resolve laid hold of her. Everything in her—breeding, teaching, tradition—demanded that she dismiss this resolve. Nancy nor her father wanted Betty Mansfield to know that mother and son. The doctor would not have evaded her query without a good reason. And yet, they belonged to that class of intellectuals from which she herself had received her training.

"Mother, this is Miss Mansfield," he had said; but he had not added: "My name is so-and-so."

In her world, persons who preferred to remain unknown acted thus for significant reasons: they did not care to know you or be known. But against this was their charming hospitality. Had they been everyday Bannister folks, she would have passed on and forgotten. The unwritten law of her kind forbade Betty to cross that threshold again. And she was going to cross it that very afternoon.

She knew that the name of the editor of the Herald was Brandon Cathewe, but beyond that, nothing.

"I am ready," she said to her father suddenly.

She gathered up the reins and swung herself into the sadle. Mansfield followed, rather startled at the abruptness.

At half after two that afternoon Betty opened the gate and hurried up to the door of the house with the white clapboards. This haste was an urgency of fear, fear that if she hesitated or looked back, she would not dare go on with the mad adventure. She rang the bell and waited.

The instant the maid recognized Betty, she drew the door full-wide. One did not forget Betty overnight.

"I veel announce Ma'm'selle . . ." began the maid in broken English.

Betty entered the living-room and sat down on the lounge. Her heart wasn't quite right; it refused to behave. In fact, it was thumping in a most disloyal fashion.

Footsteps on the stairs. Betty stood up just as the subject of many diverse cogitations entered the room. The hostess came forward with both hands outstretched, with a frankly amused smile on her lips.

"I know," she began at once. "You have come back for some music."

"I feel so ashamed! I don't know, but I believe you have hypnotized me. I wasn't invited to come again."

"Indeed you were," replied the musician.

"I was?"—delighted.

"Certainly," answered Mrs. Cathewe, going to the piano. She struck the opening bars of Mendelssohn's "Capriccio." She possessed that marvelous faculty of playing without apparently watching the keys. What a beautiful child it was! Poor sonny! With that remarkable insight to character which was his, he had read this girl aright the first time. She was desirable.

After playing several more selections, Mrs. Cathewe left the seat and knelt before the music case, a piece of beautiful Florentine marquetry. Presently she held up a sheet of music so that Betty could see the title. It was one of Wolf-Ferrari's exquisite songs.

"Do you know that?"

"Why . . . why, yes!"

"Will you sing it for me?"

"I'll try to, if you'll play the accompaniment."

Her voice was naturally a little husky and uncertain at first, but after the third attempt she found herself calm and confident; and her sweet high soprano filled the room.

When she had finished, Mrs. Cathewe performed one of those acts which artistic souls alone have the courage to perform. She caught the girl in her arms and embraced her, and Betty was pleased, thrilled and astonished.

By now it was time to go, so Betty gracefully took her leave. Then she ran down the steps to the gate, which she sent behind her with a click. Mrs. Cathewe remained in the doorway until Betty reached the corner; then she closed the door, walked thoughtfully toward the study and entered it.

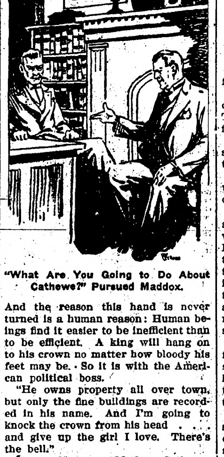
"You did not give the name, mother?" Cathewe said suddenly.

"She did not ask for it. I am very sorry for her, too. When she finds out who you are, there will be doubts. When the hour comes she will put her father on one side of the scales and you and me on the other."

"I'll see it through!"

"Is he so bad?"

"The man who opened my safe did so at the orders of Mansfield. From your description and the patrolman's frank dismay, I at once had my suspicions. I confirmed them. Now, this man's power is not based upon anything but habit, remarkable as that statement may seem. He could be overthrown by a turn of the hand.



"What Are You Going to Do About Cathewe?" Pursued Maddox.

And the reason this hand is never turned is a human reason: Human beings find it easier to be inefficient than to be efficient. A king will hang on to his crown no matter how bloody his feet may be. So it is with the American political boss.

"He owns property all over town, but only the fine buildings are recorded in his name. And I'm going to knock the crown from his head . . . and give up the girl I love. There's the bell."

It was Nancy. "Mother Cathewe, I've come to take you for a ride," she exclaimed.

"And Mother Cathewe will be delighted to go. I'll run up and change."

"I have a confession to make, Brandon," said Nancy suddenly. "A few days ago I came in to take your mother out, and while she was upstairs dressing I saw your study door open."

"You found out I was George Cottar?"

"Yes; I feel dreadful about it."

"Nonsense! It doesn't matter, or it won't matter, once I'm through this Mansfield fight. But I didn't miss anything."

"I took a rejected sheet out of the waste basket and carried it off."

"By the way, Nancy, have you got that sheet of manuscript with you?" he asked.

She gave it to him. He went into the study and returned shortly. Across the face of the manuscript he had written: "From George Cottar to Nancy Maddox, his friend."

"Thanks. What beautiful script you write!"

"That's because I'm fussy. When I cross out a word, I generally throw the sheet away. A scandalous waste of paper, but I can't help it. Here's that mother o' mine."

When she returned home, Nancy ran straight to her room, turned on the light, and got out that precious page of manuscript. "From George Cottar to Nancy Maddox, his friend." Having possessed a guilty conscience regarding the theft of the sheet, she had not dared scrutinize it heretofore. She had been ashamed to take it out of the drawer. But now she had a right. So she read the page through, and presently was struck by the curious method by which Cathewe concluded his sentences. A little cross, resembling an x. Now, what did that stir in her mind? A cross, resembling the little x. But the riddle remained unsolved.

That night a new phase of the drama unrolled. Cathewe was at his desk as usual, reading some proofs. The real estate reporter—truthfully, the cub, for the markets and real estate were his regular assignments, these jobs being the bill of fare of all cubs on provincial newspapers—came in rather breathlessly.

"Mr. Cathewe, I've stumbled on the rip-banginest yarn you ever heard tell on."

"What's happened?" asked Cathewe cordially. He did not hold to the tradition that to make a reporter out of a cub one had to scare him to death first.

"Well, I came to you because it concerns Mansfield."

"Ah!"

"Know those tenements and shacks down by his mills?"

"Yes. Supposed to be owned by Colvin, but in reality owned by Mr. Mansfield. Go on."

"And those unsavory apartments on Melville street?"

Cathewe nodded. "Also owned by Mansfield."

"Well, the sale of them was recorded with the clerk this afternoon."

"Who purchased them?"

"Miss Mansfield!"

CHAPTER VII

The Doctor Speaks.

Cathewe rocked in his swivel chair for a moment.

"Mr. White," he said frankly, "I don't want this repeated to a soul. This is a personal affair between Mansfield and his daughter."

"But the whole town will hear of it, selling property to his daughter through a dummy," protested the cub.

"No. It's a good story, but we can't use it." And with a pleasant nod he dismissed the disappointed cub.

Cathewe laid his pipe on his desk and crossed over to the window, from which he stared at the November stars. He wondered how Mansfield had failed to see how the town would interpret this equivocal sale of property. The ironmonger was disliked so heartily that folks would be only too happy to attribute the worst to him, that of mulcting his daughter of her personal fortune.

He began to feel sorry for Mansfield, for he saw what Mansfield was soon to lose. With a crystal soul like Betty's, love must have its foundation upon respect. Tear this away, and the whole edifice must topple.

At three o'clock that morning he stole up the path to the Maddox front door and pushed a letter through the slot. And the doctor read this remarkable letter while at the breakfast table:

" . . . I honestly feel sorry for him. You go up to him and urge him to confess about this real estate transaction. Impress upon him that the town will interpret the deal as a desire on his part to absorb his daughter's fortune. Keep me out of it, of course. I could use this weapon with profound effect—if I were a first-rate scoundrel. Go to him as soon as you can."

Three days later Maddox showed Mansfield the letter, and said:

"There is a chance, if you tell her; there is none, if you don't. Murder will out. You've called this young chap a scoundrel. He is an honest man."

"John," the magnate answered, "the money Betty paid for that property goes back into it two-fold. On the day the last shingle goes on I intend to return to her her check. I simply couldn't tell her part of my income for years has been from those—those places."

"Well, what are you going to do about Cathewe?" pursued Maddox.

Insistence on Song Cost Hostess Money

New York makes the most of its eminent people. Invitations to lunch, dine and dance come by the scores to those who have acquired fame by facility at one of the arts, and in many cases they are the drawing cards of the ambitious hostess.

A noted singer recently was invited to join a small group at the home of a casual friend and she accepted. After dinner the hostess cooed, "Now you must sing for us."

"I'm so sorry," said the soprano with genuine regret, "but I begin a concert tour tomorrow, and I must not use my voice till then."

"Ah, but think of the disappointment to our friends here; they came because I assured them you would sing for us. Really, I insist."

"You insist?" asked the singer.

"Assuredly."

The artist sang two songs, and on the next day the hostess received a bill "for professional services—$1,000."

Slightly in Error

"Mother, what is this Lent that you folks have been talking so much about?" asked the small daughter of Episcopalian parents. There followed a lengthy dissertation on the subject, during which the child paid close attention. At the close of the discourse, when the mother was hoping she had instilled some beautiful thoughts in the young mind, her daughter smiled angelically and said:

"Oh, so that's it. And here I thought all the time that it was that stuff you find under the bed!"

Roosevelt Says That Elephants Are "Fussy"

The ungainly elephant is as fussy as a prima donna about his toilet, according to Theodore Roosevelt, who writes about his recent hunting trip in an article in Liberty. Colonel Roosevelt tells about the tame elephants from the backs of which his party did their shooting, and says:

"The elephant, if he is to be kept in top condition, should have plenty of time for his toilet in the morning. First, he is driven out by the mahout and gathers his own breakfast—branches, leaves, etc. These he brings back to camp with him.

"After breakfast, he is taken to the river—if there is one nearby—and washed. His mahout rides him into the shallows and makes him lie down on his side. The mahout then scrubs and pounds him while the elephant sluices himself with water from his trunk until he shows up like a bulky glistening black rock in the stream."

"Why?" she inquired.

"Because," he said, "the installment on our car is due today."

WORLD-WIDE sales of quality cars and trucks

General Motors cars and trucks are sold and serviced in 104 countries. The export shipments in 1925 amounted to 119,632 motor vehicles; and the overseas assembly plants and warehouses of General Motors now number 19. This vigorous development of the world-wide market for a complete line of quality cars is important to the car buyer. It is not only a contribution to international prosperity and progress, but it also helps to maintain the continuous production program at the factories, on which low prices depend.

Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the State of Minnesota

Submitted by the Legislature at its General Session, 1925, to the People of Minnesota at the General 1926 Election Together with Statements of

Purpose and Effect of each

Prepared by
CLIFFORD L. HILTON
Attorney-General of Minnesota.

Addressed to
MIKE HOLM
Secretary of State.

ST. PAUL, MINNESOTA,
OFFICE OF ATTORNEY GENERAL,
March 30, 1926.

HONORABLE MIKE HOLM,
Secretary of State;

In compliance with the provisions of section 46, General Statutes 1923, I furnish you herewith a statement of the purpose and effect of proposed amendments to the Constitution of the State of Minnesota which are to be submitted to the electors of the state at the general election in 1926, in accordance with certain acts adopted by the legislature at the 1925 session thereof.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 1

By the adoption of chapter 428, Laws 1925, the legislature has proposed an amendment to section 2, article 6, of the constitution, relating to the supreme court. This section now reads as follows:

"Section 2. The supreme court shall consist of one chief justice and two associate justices, but the number of associate justices may be increased to a number not exceeding four, by the legislature, by a two-thirds vote, when it shall be deemed necessary. It shall have original jurisdiction in such remedial cases as may be prescribed by law, and appellate jurisdiction in all cases, both in law and equity, but there shall be no trial by jury in said court. It shall hold one or more terms in each year, as the legislature may direct, at the seat of government, and the legislature may provide, by a two-thirds vote, that one term in each year shall be held in each or any judicial district. It shall be the duty of such court to appoint a reporter of its decisions. There shall be chosen, by the qualified electors of the state, one clerk of the supreme court, who shall hold his office for the term of four years, and until his successor is duly elected and qualified; and the judges of the supreme court, or a majority of them, shall have the power to fill any vacancy in the office of clerk of the supreme court until an election can be regularly had."

Pursuant to the authority granted by this section the legislature of 1881 increased the number of associate justices to four.

If amended as proposed, this section will read as follows:

"Section 2. The supreme court shall consist of one chief justice and six associate justices. It shall have original jurisdiction in such remedial cases as may be prescribed by law, and appellate jurisdiction in all cases, both in law and equity, but there shall be no trial by jury in said court. It shall hold one or more terms in each year, as the legislature may direct, at the seat of government, and the legislature may provide, by a two-thirds vote, that one term in each year shall be held in each or any judicial district. It shall be the duty of such court to appoint a reporter of its decisions. There shall be chosen, by the qualified electors of the state, one clerk of the supreme court, who shall hold his office for the term of four years, and until his successor is duly elected and qualified; and the judges of the supreme court, or a majority of them, shall have the power to fill any vacancy in the office of clerk of the supreme court until an election can be regularly had."

The Purpose of the Proposed Amendment:

The supreme court, as now organized under the constitution, consists of a chief justice and four associate justices, all elected by the people. In 1913, in order to take care of the increasing business of the court, the legislature passed a law providing for the appointment of two commissioners to assist the court in the performance of its duties. The act under which these commissioners are appointed provides that each shall receive the same compensation as a justice of the supreme court, and also provides that if, by amendment to the constitution, the number of associate justices shall be increased to six, the office of commissioner shall be abolished.

In practice the commissioners sit as members of the court, hear arguments, read briefs, take part in discussions, write opinions, and in general do the same work as the regular justices, but they have no vote in determining the final decisions of the court. The legislature cannot give the commissioners a voice in the decisions of the court, since the organization of the court is governed by the constitution.

The purpose of the proposed amendment is to provide for the election of two or more associate justices with full authority as members of the court, to take the place of the present two commissioners, who will then cease to hold office.

The Effect of the Proposed Amendment:

The effect of the proposed amendment, if adopted, will be to provide for the election of two more associate justices of the supreme court with full authority as members of the court, replacing the present two commissioners, without additional expense.

The ballot used at the election should have printed thereon the following:

NOTE: On first proposition, if in favor of the election of two associate justices to take the place of the two appointed court commissioners, vote Yes; if opposed, vote No.

FIXING NUMBER OF SUPREME COURT JUSTICES

Amendment of Section 2, Article 6, of the Constitution (relating to the supreme court) fixing the number of justices thereof.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 2

By the adoption of chapter 427, Laws 1925, the legislature has proposed that the constitution be amended by the adoption of a new article, to be appropriately numbered and to read as follows:

ARTICLE—

Section 1. Laws may be enacted for the purpose of encouraging and promoting forestation and reforestation of lands in this state, whether owned by private persons or the public, including the fixing in advance of a definite and limited annual tax on such lands for a term of years and a yield tax at or after the end of such term upon the timber and other forest products so grown, but the taxation of mineral deposits shall not be affected by this amendment.

Section 2. Any and all provisions of the constitution of the State of Minnesota, inconsistent with the provisions of this article, are hereby repealed, so far, but only so far, as the same prohibit or limit the power of the legislature to enact laws authorizing or permitting the doing of the things hereinbefore authorized.

THE PURPOSE OF THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT:

The purpose of the proposed amendment is to confer upon the legislature express authority to enact laws encouraging and promoting forestation and reforestation of public lands and lands privately owned in this state, including the fixing in advance of a definite and limited annual tax on such lands for a term of years, and a yield tax at or after the end of such term, upon the timber and other forest products grown upon such lands.

THE EFFECT OF THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT:

The effect of the proposed amendment, if adopted, will be to authorize legislation providing for setting aside a part of the lands owned by the state for the purpose of forestation and reforestation, and permitting privately owned lands to be so set aside by act of the owner thereof, and, by way of encouragement, permitting the taxation of such lands and the timber and other forest products thereof on a special basis, which need not be uniform with the basis of taxation of other lands in the state.

The ballot used at the election should have printed thereon the following:

SECOND—

FORESTATION AND REFORESTATION OF LANDS

Amendment to the constitution of Minnesota by adding thereto a new article, to be appropriately numbered in the order of its adoption, authorizing the enactment of laws encouraging and promoting forestation and reforestation of lands in this state, whether owned by private persons or the public, including the fixing in advance of a definite and limited annual tax on such lands for a term of years and a yield tax at or after the end of such term upon the timber and other forest products so grown, but the taxation of mineral deposits shall not be affected by this amendment.

YES ——

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 3

By the adoption of chapter 429, Laws 1925, the legislature has proposed an amendment to section 3, article 10, of the constitution, relating to corporations. This section now reads as follows:

"Section 3. Each stockholder in any corporation, excepting those organized for the purpose of carrying on any kind of manufacturing or mechanical business, shall be liable to the amount of stock held or owned by him."

If amended as proposed, this section will read as follows:

"Section 3. The legislature shall have power from time to time to provide for, limit and otherwise regulate the liability of stockholders or members of corporations and co-operative corporations or associations, however organized."

THE PURPOSE OF THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT:

The constitution, as it now stands, makes each stockholder in any corporation, excepting those organized for the purpose of carrying on a manufacturing or mechanical business, liable for the debts of the corporation, if the corporate assets are insufficient to pay the debts, up to an amount equal to the par value of his stock, in addition to what was paid or should have been paid for the stock when issued.

The purpose of the proposed amendment is to authorize the legislature to prescribe and regulate by law the liability of stockholders in all corporations, including co-operative corporations or associations, however organized.

THE EFFECT OF THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT:

The effect of the proposed amendment, if adopted, will be to abrogate the present fixed rule of stockholders' liability prescribed by the constitution and to place the matter of prescribing and regulating the liability of stockholders in all corporations created under the laws of the state entirely within the control of the legislature, subject to change from time to time as they may see fit.

The ballot used at the election should have printed thereon the following:

A Word With the Old Folks

Elderly People Are Learning Importance of Good Elimination.

IN the later years of life there is apt to be a slowing up of the bodily functions. Good elimination, however, is just as essential to the old as to the young. Many old folks have learned the value of Doan's Pills when a stimulant diuretic to the kidneys is required. Scanty or burning passages of kidney secretions are often signs of improper kidney function. In most every community are scores of users and endorsers who acclaim the merit of Doan's. Ask your neighbor!

Saint as Castaway on Postage Stamp

Philatelists will be interested in the announcement that the Maltese authorities have chosen St. Publius, convert of St. Paul, for the design of their new 18-penny stamp. The saint is shown as a castaway on the island. Saints have been popular subjects with stamp designers of the Mediterranean states.

England's own patron, St. George, was used by Crete 20 years ago, and in 1919 another Maltese issue showed St. Paul escaping shipwreck. Only recently Italian stamps were issued portraying the death of St. Francis of Assisi, of which the seven hundredth anniversary occurs soon, following the example of Portugal, in commemorating the sept-centenary in 1895, of the birth of St. Anthony of Padua.

A religious design, Madonna with child, was adopted by the Hungarian post office four years ago.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

The Social Register—Can You Figure It Out?

The Social Register is coming into the limelight. That holy of holies, sacrosanct roster of society's elite is no longer mentioned only in awed whispers. It is now on the lips of the man on the street, even as the telephone book or the city directory! And who brought the sacred book from its uncontaminated, exclusive reserve into such unwanted fame? Why the people it is throwing out!

Being thrown out or "dropped" or "eliminated" from the Social Register is taking almost epidemic form. It seems to be getting more and more difficult for those for whose edification it was formed to live up to its requirements for permanent membership! And if things keep on as they have recently, we do not know what the S. R. will do for enough names to keep it a regular sized book!

A couple who are old "regulars" of the S. R. drag each other through a messy scandal and both are dropped. Of course that is comprehensive even to us humble folk who cannot (and do not) aspire to its lofty columns! Then comes the dropping of a young woman, one of the "top notchers," for marrying "beneath her." That, too, we can understand, by just putting ourselves in the exalted place of the S. R.!

Try as we may, however, to elevate our viewpoint to that of the arbiters of social prestige, we cannot understand the latest "drop" of one of its favorite daughters for marrying a count! It is true that she did not remain long by his noble side; but without even the detail of a divorce, so familiar to real society, she is dropped from the S. R. An honest-to-goodness count, with a title and estates and even a perfectly live mother to prove it—by all the known rules his title should double her space in the S. R. Instead of that she is dropped. What does the S. R. want, anyway? And, to make matters still more inexplicable, rumor has it that on the strength of a reception recently given for the young woman, under appropriate auspices, she is to be reinstated. Can you figure it out?

Some one told me of a woman who has been taking part in a veritable game of "in again, out again," in the S. R. Through the course of two marriages and two divorces she has been in and out of its pages four times! Some one has suggested that handicapped by its limitations as to new members, which is something that every successful directory must have, the S. R. must make some changes and supply excitement of some kind in order to sell the books! And yet they say they don't like to get into the papers. Can you figure it out?

"Woman's Work"

Some time ago a woman in New York returned unannounced from a hospital to surprise her husband, who had been left in charge of their five children during the month she had been under treatment for a nervous breakdown. She found him near death as a result of gas he had taken in an attempt to take his life.

The man admitted that it was caring for the home and five children that had been too much for him and had driven him to suicide.

His wife had had nervous prostration, but she could not afford the luxury of suicide. Her children needed her, so she returned from the hospital to get back on the job which had led him to try to take his life.

This item of news should be of interest to all husbands who wonder why their wives look tired when they come home in the evening, who cannot understand why anything should go wrong with the dinner or the house.

It is an answer to men who say to their wives, "What do you do all day, anyway? Nothing but a little housework and looking after the children."

It may be enlightening to him who wonders why his wife does not more resemble the girl she was when he married her, why she cannot retain her girlish figure or her youthful charm.

It is a challenge to him who compares her with the lady who swings her legs behind the footlights.

One man was driven to suicide by the care of a home and five children; many would not survive the care of two or three. At least it may be conceded that a home and two or three children without help is a full-sized job worthy of any woman or any man. Also, that any man, no matter what the importance of his work, can afford to take his hat off to any one of the thousands of women who are holding down these jobs without getting into the newspapers, without indulging in nervous prostration, without even making complaints.

It is these mothers who never think of throwing up the sponge who just keep doing the tasks that sometimes almost overwhelm them, who daily give evidence of greatness and are the heroes of the race.

"Some of my relatives told me how Tanlac had benefited them and I decided to try it. This wonder tonic cleaned out my system, toned up my liver. Now I have an old-fashioned appetite and my neuritis, sleeplessness and other troubles are gone. I like to praise Tanlac."

Sunday School Out to Win

If a St. Louis (Mo.) church can keep an average Sunday attendance of 30 adult members for the next five years, it will gain $30,000 under the will of a dead member. The pastor of the church says that there is a membership of 200 and an average Sunday attendance of 100 at the church now, and believes there should be no difficulty in complying with the terms of the will.

A Wife for Asa John

By HELEN COBB

(Copyright.)

MISS LUCY LEAVITT touched her sister's shoulder. "Susan, did you notice that Asa John walked home with Mrs. Wilson's Olive tonight?"

"Yes," nodded Susan Leavitt heavily.

"Olive Wilson is only twenty, Susan."

"And Asa John is thirty-nine."

"May and December."

"Hardly that, Lucy—May and September, I should say."

"And Asa John is a confirmed old bachelor."

"Doesn't look like it if he is beauing Olive Wilson around," said Susan, and dropped off into the nap from which Lucy's gossip had aroused her.

When Asa John locked the store door that night, he looked wistfully across the village street toward the post office where a group of young people made merry over the coming of the evening mail. He did not hear Olive Wilson's laugh.

By this time Asa John was walking slowly toward the river road and just as he stepped into the cool shadows, three women joined him with apologetic jokes and laughter—his twin sisters, Lucy and Susan, and their bosom friend, Amelia Baxter.

"You and Amelia go on ahead, Asa John, Lucy and I will come along after," said Susan. "The river certainly looks lovely tonight."

"I adore it," gushed Amelia, with an arch upward flash at Asa John's tall form. "Don't you think the river road is romantic, Asa John?"

"It has that reputation," replied Asa ponderously.

"Remember when we all went to school together?" chirped Amelia brightly. "When we came and went by this road because there was always something doing? Remember, Asa John, how you saved Mamie Wilson's life that winter when she fell through the ice and she said she was going to marry you when she grew up?"

"And Asa John told her not if he knew it," supplied Lucy.

"Humph!" said Asa John.

Susan sighed. "Well, we're all middle-aged and Mamie Wilson married Ben Jones Wilson and there's Olive, their only child, going to marry—a pretty creature but only twenty!"

"Olive going to be married?" shrieked Lucy. "You didn't tell me, sister."

"I want to know!" gasped Amelia Baxter.

"Who is she going to marry? Harry Lyons?" asked Lucy.

"Mamie hinted so herself—said Olive told her yesterday—that she was going to marry the nicest man in town if he'd have her!"

"That might be most anybody," commented Amelia, her quick eyes on Asa John's disturbed countenance.

"I guess Mamie knows who Olive means—you know that handsome young fellow that works for Asa John?"

"Not William Norton!"

"Yes," panted Susan as she hastened to keep up with Asa John's long strides. "Don't hurry so, Asa, William is a nice boy, isn't he?"

"No one better in the whole town," said Asa John slowly and emphatically.

"There, who should know better than Asa John, when William has worked for him for two years?"

Amelia patted Asa John's gray coat sleeve. "Asa John, you know very well that William isn't the nicest man in town, don't you?"

"Humph!" grunted Asa John impolitely, while Miss Lucy and her sister clung excitedly to each other. Amelia had long cast a predatory eye upon their good-looking bachelor brother, but she had never "pounced" on him like that before.

At the corner, where the river road swerved to join the village street, they parted, Amelia disappointedly walking on with Lucy and Susan while Asa John returned along the river road for a quiet pipe, he said.

Strolling back along the river road, Asa John Leavitt did not notice the white gleam of moonlight on the river, nor hear a whippoorwill singing heavily in some near wood. His thoughts were unhappily brooding over the absurdity of a man of his years falling in love with the brightness and youth of Olive Wilson, the daughter of his old schoolmate.

As he neared home again, people were coming out of the church. Wednesday evening prayer meeting was over and as he threaded the little groups giving greeting here and there, he saw Olive Wilson dismissing William Norton. "No, thank you, William," she was saying, "I can get home quite all right—I see Mr. Leavitt coming and he lives next door."

"So you are going to be married to William," observed Asa John at last, and he told her what he had heard. Olive burst into a thrill of happy laughter.

"Of course not—I never dreamed of such a thing. William is entirely too young!"

"Too young—for you?" gasped Asa giddily.

"I was joking with mother and told her I was going to marry the nicest man in the village," Olive hesitated, "but it was a joke. The nicest man would think I was young and foolish."

"Nonsense! I wish I was the nicest man!" said Asa John boldly.

"Why," stammered Olive, "of course you are!"

HIGHER THAN WOOLWORTH BUILDING

Year's Sales of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

MRS. ED. DAUGHERTY
1306 ORCHARD AVENUE, MUSCATINE, IOWA

The Woolworth Building in New York City, which towers 792 feet above the street, is the highest building in the United States.

If all the bottles of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound sold in 1925 could be placed end to end, they would make a column as high as the Woolworth Building with enough left over to extend from Lynn, Massachusetts to Cleveland, Ohio.

In many little villages as in many thriving cities along the route, who are glad to tell others about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

In a recent letter, Mrs. Daugherty says, "I was ill for four months before I took your medicine. I found one of your books at my front door and read it. It seemed to fit my case, so I began taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and after I took the third bottle, I found relief. I am on my eleventh bottle and I don't have that trouble any more, and feel like a different woman. I recommend the Vegetable Compound to every one I see who has trouble like mine. I am willing to answer any letters from women asking about the Vegetable Compound."—MRS. ED. DAUGHERTY, 1308 Orchard Avenue, Muscatine, Iowa.

Mrs. Carr Also Helped

Muncie, Indiana.—"I could not get around to do my work. I took treatments and they did me no good. I had always heard of Lydia E. Pinkham's medicine and I thought it would be like all the others, but I found out after I took half a bottle, as I have proved it wonderful. I am taking it yet and I can do all my work. I am feeling fine now, and it is your good medicines that have done it. I tell every woman of the good I get from taking the Vegetable Compound and from using the Sanative Wash."—MRS. P. W. CARR, 721 West Powers St., Muncie, Indiana.

Compliment at Least Had Its Sugary Side

Some of the funniest things that happen on motion picture sets are utter surprises to all concerned and often throw the mirth-making efforts of the high-priced talent into the shade. At Hal Roach's recently, they had a colored couple working in one of the comedies and they were called upon to do a love scene.

"Just ad lib it," said the director, "just make love the way you naturally would."

So they snuggled up together and Sam said: "Liza, you is exactly like brown sugar."

"How come I is like brown sugar?" demanded Liza belligerently.

"Sweet, but awful unrefined," was the unexpected answer.—Los Angeles Times.

Better than the inferiority complex or the superiority complex is the indifference complex.

Concerning Cats

A reader writes as follows:

"I noticed that from time to time you make complaint about the racket kicked up on your back fence by yowling, spitting, fighting cats.

"Well, don't you know what is the matter with the cats? I guess you would yowl and spit and fight, too, if you had to go around in a thick fur coat with the mercury marking 90 in the shade. The trouble with the cats is that they are hot, peeved and ugly on account of wearing so much fur."

All of which may be true, but they yowl and spit and fight in the winter just the same. Probably this is on account of their having cold feet.—Brooklyn Standard Union.

FOR COUNTY TREASURER

To the Voters of Marshall County:

Having received the nomination for the office of County Treasurer, I come before you again for your consideration at the General Election on November 2, 1926.

As I realize that I am not very well known in some parts of the County, I think it is only fair to let you know who I am, and also my qualifications for the office. I am a graduate from one of the leading business colleges in this part of the country, and for a good many years past I have been bookkeeper and cashier in a large Department store, so I am well acquainted with office work.

I would like to make a personal call on every voter, but owing to the large territory to be covered, this will be impossible. I will therefore have to rely on my old and new friends for their support and for their votes on Election-day, November 2, 1926.

I shall sincerely appreciate whatever you do for me, and if elected I shall do my very best to serve the people and fulfill the duties of the office of County Treasurer carefully and impartially to all.

Respectfully yours.
PETER E. KVIKSTAD.

Attorney Ira H. Burhans
Candidate for
COUNTY ATTORNEY

Of Burhans, the Stephen Messenger, his home paper, says:

"Attorney Ira H. Burhans, candidate for county attorney, came to Stephen in January of 1918 to take over P. A. McClernan's law practice, and has actively engaged in the practice of law here since that time, except for 18 monhts service as a buck private in the army with the 55th Engineers, A. E. F. with whom he served a year in France. Since his return he has been active in Legion affairs, being twice commander of the local post. He is a republican by party affiliation.

"Before coming to Stephen he worked for County Attorney W. A. Blanchard, of Anoka county, gaining practical legal experience. He is 35 years old, born at Superior, Wis., a son of Ira W. Burhans, a lawyer of Holland Dutch extraction, and Helen Louise Hatch of New Hampshire Yankee blood. He comes of a family of lawyers, his maternal grandfather also being a lawyer. In 1917 he married Millie Christine Newhouse, of Norwegian extraction, and four children bless his home. His early life was spent in Superior, where he graduated from high school and worked in a law office.

"Burhans is plain-spoken, plain-acting, and works for the man that hires him. He has as good a legal training as the University of this state gives lawyers, and is a trial lawyer of promise."

Be sure that I will appreciate your help. If elected, I give my pledge to conduct the affairs of the County Attorneyship fairly and openly, giving consideration and a square deal to the rich and poor alike.

BRAGGANS
FOR
County Attorney

If you beleive I have made a fairly good County Attorney, I ask for your support

W. O. Braggans, the present County attorney, took office November 1, 1923, to fill the unexpired term of the late John R. Naeseth. He has conducted the affairs of his office with credit to himself and the County and is now a candidate to succeed himself. Mr. Braggans was born November 9th, 1876. He attended the public grade schools at Kingsville, Ohio, until 14 years of age, when he was obliged to leave school and seek work. He did not again attend school until he entered the law department of the University of Minnesota in 1898. Upon leaving the grade schools he worked in the nail mills and glass factories in and around Wheeling, W. Va., and in 1892 came west, settling at Milbank, S. D. He studied law in the office of Thos. L. Souck while working as a stenographer and was licensed to practice law in S. Dak., in 1898. That fall he entered the law department at the University of Minnesota, and graduated therefrom in the same class with Julius J. Olson of Warren, and was licensed to practice law in Minnesota in 1900. He immediately entered the employment of the Supreme Court as a stenographer and stayed there until appointed Court Reporter by Judge Grindeland of Warren in 1902, when he came to Warren, where he has since resided. He was married in 1901 to E. Letha McKenzie of Knox City, Mo., and they have three children; a girl now working in a law office in Chicago as a stenographer, and two boys now attending the public schools at Warren. Mr. Braggans is somewhat of a self-made man as indicted from the fact that he did not receive much schooling; he is industrious, capable and if re-elected will do his best to serve the interests of the people of the county.

Thanking you for the support received in the past, and respectfully soliciting your support and vote on election day, November 2nd, 1926. I am,

PAID POLITICAL ADVERTISING

Inserted for, and to be paid for at regular advertising rates by the candidates whose names appear below.

For Representative in the Legislature From Marshall County

To the Voters of Marshall County:—

As it will be impossible for me to call on all of you personally, I take this method of reminding you that, having received the greatest number of votes of any of the candidates for Representative, at the June Primary, I am a candidate for re-election to the office of Representative for Marshall County, and also to thank you all for the splendid support and vote of confidence you gave me at the Primary Election.

If reelected, I pledge myself to devote my best efforts to the interests of my District and the State at large.

I am not asking for your support as the candidate of any Political Party, but, according to the Laws of Minnesota, as the candidate of the People of Marshall County. I believe that a Representative should be elected to represent the whole District instead of a particular Political Party. I believe that, with my experience and my friendship with the older members of the Legislature, I will be able to accomplish more than a new member can.

I stand for a fair deal for all the People, regardless of their business, occupation or political affiliation.

I believe that when the Legislature passes a Law and agrees to pay any institution or municipality certain State Aid, they should keep their promise by appropriating the money to pay it. I believe that the Mothers Pension and the Supplemental School Aid should be paid.

I believe that the Banking Laws of the State should be so amended as to give protection to the depositors; that there should be a sufficient amount taken from the Trunk Highway Fund, each year, to take care of the County Reimbursement Bonds and interest; that there should be such a division of the State School Funds as would give relief to the schools in districts where the taxable property valuation is lowest; that our Co-Operative Laws should remain inviolate so that our Co-operative Creameries, Poultry Associations, and any other Co-operative association, may continue to operate and be protected from the interference of outside interests; that any sound Legislation for the best interests of Agriculture should be enacted into Law.

Again thanking you for your support in the past and assuring you that I will endeavor to merit your support in the future, I remain,

Yours truly,
—F. A. GREEN,
Candidate for Representative for Marshall County, in the 67th Legislative District.

Argon Gas Stored in All Organisms

Electric-light bulbs are not the only thing that contains argon. This supposedly rare inert gaseous element has lately been discovered in the cells of a number of organisms, and is presumably present in the cells of all living things, says a Science Service bulletin.

A French scientist, A. Pictet, reported recently before the Paris Academy of Sciences that he and two associates had extracted a little less than a third of a cubic centimeter of the gas from a gram of dried yeast and that they had later found it also in sheep's brains and in the blood of oxen. They explain its presence on the hypothesis that the gas, being exceedingly inactive chemically, slowly accumulates in the cells as it is carried there, and has no means of elimination because it does not combine with other elements. It thus remains stored in the cells until their death and disintegration.

Nigerian Cookery

The method of cooking a dinner for a family of Nigerian natives has continued unchanged since time immemorial. The native's kitchen is any convenient spot in the open and his method is to make a fire and, while it is getting well started, cut a number of skewers, on which strips of meat are impaled, according to the Wide World Magazine.

These skewers are stuck in the earth in a circle around the fire. When one side of the piece of meat is "done" in the opinion of the native chef, the skewer is given a twist so as to expose a fresh surface to the flames. The circumference of the circle of skewers varies with the number of persons to be fed.

Troublesome "Corridor"

The so-called Danzig corridor is a narrow strip of country extending across Germany to the Baltic sea just west of Danzig. It gives Poland an outlet to the sea. It is one of the chief obstructions to peace in Europe and not long ago a member of the French cabinet described it as "a drafty corridor, singularly apt to give statesmen bad colds, if not fatal pneumonia."

"Break him!" Mansfield brought his fist down upon his desk. "Break him! I am iron there. I'll tell you why." And he recounted the episode on board the giant Cunarder in 1912.

As he listened to this almost incredible tale the doctor's heart went down, down. The boy loved Betty, had come here to win her and his anger against Mansfield's malefactions had switched him onto another trail. Nancy! Out of all these curious actions and reactions hers would be the broken heart.

He put Cathewe's letter away and got up. "Dunleigh, you're going home to lose your fight. You're going to lose your daughter, too. Tell her, man; tell her why you played such a farce as this real estate deal. Tell her the truth. Tell her that for years you've lived for and by yourself, a monument to selfishness. Tell her you took rents from the plague districts because you'd lost the perspectives of morality. That you never cared who rented the flats and apartments so long as the rents were forthcoming. Tell her you've taken money from honest men, through legal trickery. Tell her that you had forgotten her mother. Lord! Lord! Don't you know that women always forgive if you tell them; that they never forgive if the story comes to them from a third person? You've got the idea that you must cringe. Tell her with your chin up. If you've got to lose her, lose her like a sportsman," and the indignant Maddox rushed out of the study and out of the house.

Mansfield, with a rather childish burst of fury against the tides of fate that were closing in upon him, stalked to the study door and locked it. How many times did he stride from the fireplace to the far wall and back? A hundred times two, three hundred times.

Until this hour he had looked upon the real-estate deal with a kind of dry humor. When the hour came he would refund Betty's outlay. Wasn't that enough?

He dropped into his club at five and decided to dine there. He was still in a towering rage, and he did not care to face the girl's clear eyes until he had himself in hand. But he brought home some new books and a box of candy, which he placed before her door.

* * * * * * *

As Maddox entered his house he was greeted by a question from Nancy.

"Did you order that awning?"

"Awning?"

"Heavens, he's forgotten! Don't you know what day this is?"

"Thursday."

"What date?"

He looked at his calendar and then his jaw dropped. Her birthday, and he had forgotten all about it! He jumped up, kissed her, and stormed back to the office where he had left his hat and coat. He rushed out and down to the chariot and went clattering off. He did not stop until he reached the shop of Bannister's fashionable jewelers. He was a rare visitor, but they knew him well.

"Daniels," he began, a little out of breath, "this is my daughter Nancy's birthday. I want a trinket that'll make her forget everything, even the day she was born," he added humorously.

"That falls in nicely," replied the jeweler. "We had something in the window the other day that attracted her."

"I see," said Maddox, preparing himself for the worst. "Pearls. Well, let me see it." So far as he was concerned, pills and pearls looked exactly alike. He would have to trust Daniels absolutely. "How much?" he asked, after a glance at the string.

"Twenty-five hundred."

"Wrap it up—and charge. A thousand December first and the balance January first.

"Six months, if you like. We folks make you wait often enough."

From her bedroom window Nancy saw her father's return; but she did not run down to greet him. She was wondering what would happen when Brand and Betty Mansfield saw each other across the table at dinner that evening.

* * * * * * *

Cathewe returned from New York that morning. He was not aware that a man, very much interested in his affairs, followed him out of the car and to the taxicab stand. He sent a cold, level glance into the middle of Cathewe's back. At the taxicab stand he selected a cab for himself and directed the chauffeur to proceed at once to Dunleigh Mansfield's on Polygon hill. There will be no more of him. He comes into the story and goes out of it, comet-wise. But an astronomer will tell you that the aftermath of comets is devastation, annihilation, and obliteration. How many times, though, has this old top stood wincing for the blow, to escape by a hair—the hair of the comet's tail?

Cathewe had an appointment at the office. The appointee was not a willing one; he was bowing to force. When he arrived his air was nonchalant, except for the restless and continuous shifting of the strong cigar from one corner of his mouth to the other.

"Well, here I am," he said impudently.

"Sit down, Shafer. Now, exactly, why did you, a member of the city's detective force, enter my home like a burglar and break into my safe?"

"Because we had information that you might be some kind of a crook," was the ready answer.

"You lie, Shafer, I'm going to give you a month to find a new job out of town. Oh, I shouldn't have sent for you if I hadn't something on you, as you would say."

"Nothing doing," answered the detective.

"I'm not going to say any more. The interview is over. Good morning. Thirty days. . . . or five years."

"What's that?"

"Five years. The evidence I have against you may be computed in so much prison time. Good morning."

The blood boiled up in the detective's face; but the cold blue eyes looking up into his made him reconsider the impulse to start something of a purely physical nature. He left.

Cathewe swung his chair around to his desk just as the telephone rang.

It was Nancy, who wanted to make sure that he would attend her birthday dinner.

A pause. "Sure I'll be there," he answered.

"Brand, how came you to make those curious little periods in your manuscripts?"

"Periods. Oh, I see. You mean the cross. That is the habit of newspaper writers. It is to indicate to the compositor that the sentence ends there."

"Ah! I was just curious. Now I understand. At seven, then, Mr. Cottar!"

She left the phone and saw Betty, who had just come in, standing in the hall.

"I received a letter this morning," said Betty, slowly.

"A letter?"

"Don't you remember?"

"You mean a letter from that shadow man you told me about in Washington?"

"Yes. . . . I. . . I had to sit down when I saw that envelope. My knees wouldn't hold me up."

"Was it postmarked New York?"

"Yes. It isn't fair. The whole thing hasn't been fair. I had never injured anyone. I wasn't a flirt. The letter, Nancy, was goodby."

"You'll get over it, dear?" said Nancy, hating herself. A word or two, and the riddle would be solved. Generous beyond ordinary, she stifled the impulse to take that page of manuscript from her bosom and spread it out for Betty to see. Once, indeed, her hand did steal up; but stonily she forced it down. What was the use in telling Betty? said Specious Argument. Wasn't there the width of the poles between Betty Mansfield and this shadow man? Hadn't he himself made it impossible?

CHAPTER VIII

On the morning that Cathewe arrived from New York the cub reporter, an industrious chap, got down before lunch and went into the file room. Using his penknife he hacked out every editorial and news story he could find relating to Mansfield. When this task was completed he put them into a manila envelope, sealed and stamped it, and carried it over to the post office, where he dropped it into the local mail-slot.

Then he was suddenly seized with regret and wished he had used more discretion.

He quitted the post office for the street, and walked half a block. There was no use arguing; he would have to get that letter back. He turned and trotted back to the post office, entered one of its rear doors and interviewed the chief clerk.

"Can't be done," the latter replied. "It'll have to go through."

That seemed final.

The cub saw that the case was hopeless. Utterly miserable, he turned into a side street and sought a favorite haunt of his—a buffet-saloon. He ordered a plate of hash and a cup of coffee and was striving to swallow without choking when his "listening in" faculties were aroused by a snatch of conversation in the next booth.

"Tonight—guard at the south gate—more isolated."

Once in the street he made for the police station as fast as his legs could carry him. He dashed into the day captain's office. He made a bad beginning. He introduced himself and his paper.

"Huh! Well, whadda yuh want?"

"Overheard somebody in Cahill's talking about blowing up something tonight. They're there yet. Can you give me a couple of men?"

"On your way! Everybody's seeing things."

"You refuse?"

"Clear out!" belligerently. "The Herald ain't too popular in here. Mog!"

The reporter ran back to Cahill's, and the blood jumped into his throat, when he observed that the men had not yet gone. Thrilled, he sat down and ordered another cup of coffee. He would trail these chaps; and trail them he did. North, east, south and west, through this alley and that, toward the country, back to town, off for the railroad yard and back to Cahill's

They kept him there at Cahill's until 9 o'clock that night.

At nine the men departed, and the cub began his trailing again. This time there were no tortuous windings. The men headed directly toward the railway yard, and the cub decided that they were going to wreck the Mansfield steel mills.

Suddenly his men vanished. The boy fell into a dog-trot to the end of a string of empty freight cars. As he passed the last car, the sky fell out. When he came to his senses he could see the cold starry sky above him. It had stopped snowing earlier in the evening. He was at the bottom of a coal car, which might be hauled to the main line at any moment. In that event he would breakfast somewhere around Scranton.

It was midnight when he climbed the stairs to the editorial rooms. His face and hands were streaked with blood and coal-dust; he was a sartorial as well as a physical wreck. Instinctively, he staggered toward Cathewe's door—open as usual—because he knew that the chief would not laugh at him.

"Chief!" began the boy, rocking on his heels. "They—got me!—I was a boob to try it a—alone! But I thought—if I reported here, you'd laugh or send somebody else. Anyhow I tried—."

Cathewe turned his head and sprang to his feet just in time to catch the boy as he pitched forward.

* * * * * * *

Before leaving for Nancy's that night Betty told her father that she, too, held Cathewe in the hollow of her hand and could crush him at will.

She kissed him and sped to the door, where she paused for a second. What a handsome man he was, this daddy of hers! In after days she always thanked God for that glance; for she never saw her father's face like that again.

Mansfield selected a cigar, forgetting his own dinner was in the process of making, and blew a cloud above his head. What the dickens had the child discovered concerning Cathewe, Cathewe the impeccable, at least here in Bannister? What had she discovered that the local police force could not? The hollow of her hand, she had said. She was her father's daughter.

Day of Realization for Conceit's Victim

Conceit is something like red paint. The first time one tries it, even a trifle of it looks bad. The next time it doesn't look so bad. The third time you put on a little more to make it look better. Then you have to keep adding a dab or two a day to make you feel toward yourself the way you felt on the first day you tried it.

Everybody else knows this but you. You carry your conceit about you so plainly that even in your silence it is evident.

But nobody dares tell you about it, and if he did you wouldn't believe him. Until one day, after you have struggled and suffered and risen above things and fallen and got up and are forty and have married and are growing slightly gray, a little miss of ten climbs on your knee, and grabs your cheeks in both hands, and—yes, right there in the presence of horrid relatives—blurts out: "Daddy, mamma says you are the most conceited man she knows."

And then you know.—Kansas City Star.

Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the State of Minnesota

Submitted by the Legislature at its General Session, 1925, to the People of Minnesota at the General 1926 Election Together with Statements of

Purpose and Effect of each

Prepared by
CLIFFORD L. HILTON
Attorney-General of Minnesota.

Addressed to
MIKE HOLM
Secretary of State.

ST. PAUL, MINNESOTA,
OFFICE OF ATTORNEY GENERAL,
March 30, 1926.

HONORABLE MIKE HOLM,
Secretary of State,

In compliance with the provisions of section 46, General Statutes 1923, I furnish you herewith a statement of the purpose and effect of proposed amendments to the Constitution of the State of Minnesota which are to be submitted to the electors of the state at the general election in 1926, in accordance with certain acts adopted by the legislature at the 1925 session thereof.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 1

By the adoption of chapter 428, Laws 1925, the legislature has proposed an amendment to section 2, article 6, of the constitution, relating to the supreme court. This section now reads as follows:

"Section 2. The supreme court shall consist of one chief justice and two associate justices, but the number of associate justices may be increased to a number not exceeding four, by the legislature, by a two-thirds vote, when it shall be deemed necessary. It shall have original jurisdiction in such remedial cases as may be prescribed by law, and appellate jurisdiction in all cases, both in law and equity, but there shall be no trial by jury in said court. It shall hold one or more terms in each year, as the legislature may direct, at the seat of government, and the legislature may provide, by a two-thirds vote, that one term in each year shall be held in each or any judicial district. It shall be the duty of such court to appoint a reporter of its decisions. There shall be chosen, by the qualified electors of the state, one clerk of the supreme court, who shall hold his office for the term of four years, and until his successor is duly elected and qualified; and the judges of the supreme court, or a majority of them, shall have the power to fill any vacancy in the office of clerk of the supreme court until an election can be regularly had."

Pursuant to the authority granted by this section the legislature of 1881 increased the number of associate justices to four.

If amended as proposed, this section will read as follows:

"Section 2. The supreme court shall consist of one chief justice and six associate justices. It shall have original jurisdiction in such remedial cases as may be prescribed by law, and appellate jurisdiction in all cases, both in law and equity, but there shall be no trial by jury in said court. It shall hold one or more terms in each year, as the legislature may direct, at the seat of government, and the legislature may provide, by a two-thirds vote, that one term in each year shall be held in each or any judicial district. It shall be the duty of such court to appoint a reporter of its decisions. There shall be chosen, by the qualified electors of the state, one clerk of the supreme court, who shall hold his office for the term of four years, and until his successor is duly elected and qualified; and the judges of the supreme court, or a majority of them, shall have the power to fill any vacancy in the office of clerk of the supreme court until an election can be regularly had."

The Purpose of the Proposed Amendment:

The supreme court, as now organized under the constitution, consists of a chief justice and four associate justices, all elected by the people. In 1913, in order to take care of the increasing business of the court, the legislature passed a law providing for the appointment of two commissioners to assist the court in the performance of its duties. The act under which these commissioners are appointed provides that each shall receive the same compensation as a justice of the supreme court, and also provides that if, by amendment to the constitution, the number of associate justices shall be increased to six, the office of commissioner shall be abolished.

In practice the commissioners sit as members of the court, hear arguments, read briefs, take part in discussions, write opinions, and in general do the same work as the regular justices, but they have no vote in determining the final decisions of the court. The legislature cannot give the commissioners a voice in the decisions of the court, since the organization of the court is governed by the constitution.

The purpose of the proposed amendment is to provide for the election of two or more associate justices with full authority as members of the court, to take the place of the present two commissioners, who will then cease to hold office.

The Effect of the Proposed Amendment:

The effect of the proposed amendment, if adopted, will be to provide for the election of two more associate justices of the supreme court with full authority as members of the court, replacing the present two commissioners, without additional expense.

The ballot used at the election should have printed thereon the following:

NOTE: On first proposition, if in favor of the election of two associate justices to take the place of the two appointed court commissioners, vote Yes; if opposed, vote No.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 2

By the adoption of chapter 427, Laws 1925, the legislature has proposed that the constitution be amended by the adoption of a new article, to be appropriately numbered and to read as follows:

ARTICLE—

Section 1. Laws may be enacted for the purpose of encouraging and promoting forestation and reforestation of lands in this state, whether owned by private persons or the public, including the fixing in advance of a definite and limited annual tax on such lands for a term of years and a yield tax at or after the end of such term upon the timber and other forest products so grown, but the taxation of mineral deposits shall not be affected by this amendment.

Section 2. Any and all provisions of the constitution of the State of Minnesota, inconsistent with the provisions of this article, are hereby repealed, so far, but only so far, as the same prohibit or limit the power of the legislature to enact laws authorizing or permitting the doing of the things hereinbefore authorized.

THE PURPOSE OF THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT:

The purpose of the proposed amendment is to confer upon the legislature express authority to enact laws encouraging and promoting forestation and reforestation of public lands and lands privately owned in this state, including the fixing in advance of a definite and limited annual tax on such lands for a term of years, and a yield tax at or after the end of such term, upon the timber and other forest products grown upon such lands.

THE EFFECT OF THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT:

The effect of the proposed amendment, if adopted, will be to authorize legislation providing for setting aside a part of the lands owned by the state for the purpose of forestation and reforestation, and permitting privately owned lands to be so set aside by act of the owner thereof, and, by way of encouragement, permitting the taxation of such lands and the timber and other forest products thereof on a special basis, which need not be uniform with the basis of taxation of other lands in the state.

The ballot used at the election should have printed thereon the following:

FORESTATION AND REFORESTATION OF LANDS

Amendment to the constitution of Minnesota by adding thereto a new article, to be appropriately numbered in the order of its adoption, authorizing the enactment of laws encouraging and promoting forestation and reforestation of lands in this state, whether owned by private persons or the public, including the fixing in advance of a definite and limited annual tax on such lands for a term of years and a yield tax at or after the end of such term upon the timber and other forest products so grown, but the taxation of mineral deposits shall not be affected by this amendment.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 3

By the adoption of chapter 429, Laws 1925, the legislature has proposed an amendment to section 3, article 10, of the constitution, relating to corporations. This section now reads as follows:

"Section 3. Each stockholder in any corporation, excepting those organized for the purpose of carrying on any kind of manufacturing or mechanical business, shall be liable to the amount of stock held or owned by him."

If amended as proposed, this section will read as follows:

"Section 3. The legislature shall have power from time to time to provide for, limit and otherwise regulate the liability of stockholders or members of corporations and co-operative corporations or associations, however organized."

THE PURPOSE OF THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT:

The constitution, as it now stands, makes each stockholder in any corporation, excepting those organized for the purpose of carrying on a manufacturing or mechanical business, liable for the debts of the corporation, if the corporate assets are insufficient to pay the debts, up to an amount equal to the par value of his stock, in addition to what was paid or should have been paid for the stock when issued.

The purpose of the proposed amendment is to authorize the legislature to prescribe and regulate by law the liability of stockholders in all corporations, including co-operative corporations or associations, however organized.

THE EFFECT OF THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT:

The effect of the proposed amendment, if adopted, will be to abrogate the present fixed rule of stockholders' liability prescribed by the constitution and to place the matter of prescribing and regulating the liability of stockholders in all corporations created under the laws of the state entirely within the control of the legislature, subject to change from time to time as they may see fit.

The ballot used at the election should have printed thereon the following:

THIS WOMAN'S BATTLE

Wins Against Ill Health

"At times I was hardly able to do my housework," writes Mrs. Margaret Wallace of 1547 Safford Ave., Columbus, Ohio. How many women have found themselves in this same condition! How many women have fought bravely on day after day, cooking, washing, ironing, doing the dishes, and keeping the house clean, when they were in a weakened condition and had not sufficient strength to perform these duties easily and properly!

When Mrs. Wallace was experiencing great difficulty in carrying on the daily tasks, a friend advised her to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and she gave it a fair trial. "I just can't give enough thanks to it," she writes. "Now I can eat anything at all and I am feeling better than I have for years. I shall never be without your medicine again."

A woman who is fighting for her health and her family's happiness is a valiant soldier. She wages her battle in her own kitchen. She has no thrilling bugles to cheer her on, no waving banners.

Many other women tell us, as Mrs. Wallace did, that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound was their faithful ally in the struggle for better health.

Appraising the Situation

Bill—How's Benny doing in the hospital?

Bud—Fairly well, but I don't think he will be out as soon as expected.

Bill—How did you find out, see the doctors?

Bud—No! I saw his nurse.

Keep Eliminative System Active

Good Health Requires Good Elimination.

ONE can't feel well when there is a retention of poisonous waste in the blood. This is called a toxic condition, and is apt to make one tired, dull and languid. Other symptoms are sometimes toxic backaches and headaches. That the kidneys are not functioning properly is often shown by scanty or burning passage of secretions. Many people have learned the value of Doan's Pills, a stimulant diuretic, when the kidneys seem functionally inactive. Everywhere one finds enthusiastic Doan's users. Ask your neighbor!

HUSBAND MURDERS WIFE WITH AX AS KISS IS SCORNED

Killed in Bed Because Spouse Objected to Her Going Out Nights.

Brooklyn, N. Y.—Because his attractive wife had found other interests and refused to remain home at night, Antonio di Palo, twenty-seven, a laborer, killed her in bed with an ax, he confessed to police of the Wilson avenue station, Brooklyn.

The murder was committed while the four young children of the couple slept in an adjoining room, and was discovered by them when they rushed into their mother's room shouting for breakfast. Their screams brought neighbors, who found Mrs. di Palo with her head almost severed and her body mutilated.

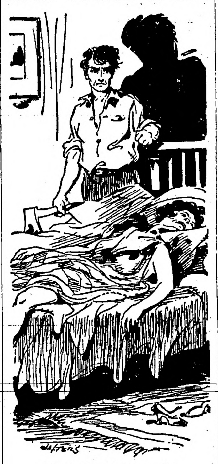
According to neighbors, Mr. and Mrs. di Palo had quarreled recently because the pretty young wife dressed in her best and went out nights. She took in sewing and told her husband she was using her own money.

Kiss Is Scorned.

The night before the tragedy, according to her children, she prepared their dinner, left her husband's on the stove and went to the movies. She returned at eleven o'clock, her husband told police, and he asked:

"Rose, don't you care for me any more?"

She gave him an abrupt answer, he said, and they went to bed. At six o'clock Di Palo awoke and tried to kiss her. She refused him with a curse, he said. He got the ax from behind the bathtub and killed her. He then dressed in his best clothing and left the house.



Killed Her With an Ax.

Di Palo, employed by the Insulation company of York and French streets, Brooklyn, is described by neighbors as a hard-working and family-loving man.

Lost Mothers, Children, Found Praying in Forest

East Douglas, Mass.—Kneeling in prayer, two women and three children who had been lost in dense woods were found huddled under a tree early in the day. They had been lost for twelve hours and were four miles from where they had entered the woods.

They were Mrs. Louis Chabot of Whitinsville, her two children, Louis and Joseph, aged nine and ten respectively, and Mrs. Chabot's sister-in-law, Mrs. Adelard Chabot, and her nine-year-old daughter.

The missing party was found by one of a posse of over 100 men who had answered a call for assistance when it became known that the women and children were lost.

Boy, Five, Bites the Dog; It's "Whale of a Yarn"

Pittsburgh.—"If a dog bites a man, that's not news, but if a man bites a dog, that's a whale of a story," says the reporters' text book.

Anyhow, Thomas McGinley, five years old, son of County Detective James McGinley, simply "fought fire with fire," when his pet police dog snapped at him.

As a result, the dog became a patient of a veterinary surgeon. A piece was bitten out of one ear.

The boy was treated by a physician for minor injuries.

Unused in 32 Years, Jail Is Torn Down

Yellowstone Park, Wyo.—The Yellowstone National park jail has not held a prisoner in its 32 years of existence and now has been razed.

"The only thing the jail has held has been liquor which has been found cached by rum runners from the Canadian border," a park official asserted.

The jail was built in 1894, when the park was under the administration of the United States army. At that time prisoners were housed in the army guardhouse.

Do We Understand Them?

"Isn't it strange," said a guest to waiter George Washington, "that the cat at the drug store seems to understand me when I speak to her?"

"The other day, when she was sick," she seemed to know that I was pitying her. Today, when I went in, she reached her paw out from the window, where she was sunning herself, and actually smiled. It was as though she said:

"'Look at me! I'm well, now'."

"Yaas, miss; yaas," the man named for the father of his country answered:

"They un'nerstan's us. All the beasts does. But we doan un'nerstan' them. They knows what we says an' how we acts. An then they tries to talk back, but we doan' know what it is they're a sayin'.

"We jus' thinks the cat's a-mew'n' or the dog's a-barkin' or the horse's a-neighin'.

"But I sense it's more. It's a lot they has to say, miss. But we hasn't done got the sense to get holt of it'."

Then George Washington went to fetch the dessert.

And as tawny Thomas Henry, who had been snoozing by the fireplace, turned over slowly, opening green eyes to gaze at the guest, she thought:

"I wonder if George Washington is right.

"What is Thomas Henry thinking of now? he's meowing. And I'm too stupid to know what he means, unless he looks at the milk pitcher or casts an appraising eye at the meat platter or pats my dress to show that he wants to jump up."

Perhaps not only Tabbys and Rovers, mooey cows and great, fine horses, but timid, caged canaries, with forest memories in their subconscious selves; bald eagles, aloft on blasted pines, glancing down at passing voyagers; jungle beasts kept in rock caves in the parks, and all the rest of the apparently dumb creation, the tiny speechless things and the big, all think their thoughts, cry their cries, make their eloquent appeals to us, the self-satisfied lords of creation.

And, as waiter George Washington said:

"They un'erstan's us, but we doan' un'nerstan' them."

Sympathy Is Something More Than Pity

Have you a friend to whom you can tell your troubles but not your joys? Is she one who is always ready to feel sorry for you and to mourn with you, but is busy or preoccupied or inattentive when you tell her something good that has come your way or some pleasant plans over which you would like her to become enthused?

Then she is one of those people who think that sympathy means only being able to understand our friends' troubles and being willing to shed tears with them.

There are many people like that who, when it comes to the point, are really our good friends. They simply do not realize that sympathy is a bigger, broader quality than pity, that it is the power and the willingness to enter into every experience in our friends' lives, to thrill to their joys as well as feel with their disappointments or losses.

Even some parents do not understand the real quality of sympathy. They have not kept close enough to youth to be in sympathy with the viewpoint and the ideas of their children. And so they remain out of touch with those that mean the whole world to them.

If a girl had a good time at the dance last night, she loves to tell some one all about it. And getting a sympathetic "that must have been thrilling, Mame—what did you do then?" she lives it all over again.

If she is looking forward to her summer vacation it adds to the joys of anticipation to have some one else sympathetic and interested in it.

If she is planning her Easter wardrobe, she likes her friend to enter into it with her. A phlegmatic, indifferent answer to the question "Do you think I should get a suit or a coat?" is the unkindest cut of all from a friend

True, broad sympathy with all human relationships is a gift which some of us have in greater measure than others. But it is a gift that we can all cultivate if we stop to think of doing as we would be done by, by our friends.

Public Health Service

The United States public health service dates back to 1798, when congress passed an act for the relief of sick and disabled seamen. This small beginning accounts for the present location of the bureau in the Treasury department, the customs service having always been closely connected with the treasury.

Concerning Patents

There is no set period which must elapse between the filing of an application and the issuance of a patent. It varies with the amount of work the application involves. The patent office is always months behind in its work, so that, not infrequently, a year or more elapses before letters patent are issued.

Well-Known Mason Restored to Good Health

Victim of Dizziness, Indigestion, Loss of Strength, Retired Farmer Restored to Health by Tanlac. Gains 12 Pounds

Brawn, muscle and splendid health that nature gives to us cannot withstand the terrible strain and stress of modern living. But health can be regained and protected against attack. Andrew Loucks, a well-known Stewartville, Minnesota, citizen, a member of the Pleasant Grove Lodge of Masons, says: "Tanlac has made me feel as if I could go out on the farm and do a big day's work.

"I was greatly troubled with my stomach. And at times indigestion would be so bad that I would have vomiting spells followed by cramps. I was restless and my condition shattered my nerves. At night I would toss and turn waiting for sleep that never came. Often I was so dizzy I could not keep my balance. I was getting weaker every day when I decided to take Tanlac.

"After the first bottle I noticed a great deal of improvement. I am on my fifth bottle now and am enjoying good health. I eat everything with a ravenous appetite. I have gained 12 pounds. Indigestion never troubles me; neither do dizzy spells. Tanlac has made me feel years younger."

Banish sickness and sufferings from your life. Benefit by the experience of others. Tanlac made from roots, barks and herbs according to the famous Tanlac formula, usually builds up weak, scrawny bodies, relieves suffering, restores good health. First bottle shows amazing results. At druggists. More than 40 million bottles sold.

FOR COUNTY TREASURER

To the Voters of Marshall County:

Having received the nomination for the office of County Treasurer, I come before you again for your consideration at the General Election on November 2, 1926.

As I realize that I am not very well known in some parts of the County, I think it is only fair to let you know who I am, and also my qualifications for the office. I am a graduate from one of the leading business colleges in this part of the country, and for a good many years past I have been bookkeeper and cashier in a large Department store, so I am well acquainted with office work.

I would like to make a personal call on every voter, but owing to the large territory to be covered, this will be impossible. I will therefore have to rely on my old and new friends for their support and for their votes on Election-day, November 2, 1926.

I shall sincerely appreciate whatever you do for me, and if elected I shall do my very best to serve the people and fulfill the duties of the office of County Treasurer carefully and impartially to all.

Respectfully yours,
PETER E. KVIKSTAD.

Attorney Ira H. Burhans
Candidate for
COUNTY ATTORNEY

Of Burhans, the Stephen Messenger, his home paper, says:

" Attorney Ira H. Burhans, candidate for county attorney, came to Stephen in January of 1918 to take over P. A. McClernan's law practice, and has actively engaged in the practice of law here since that time, except for 18 monhts service as a buck private in the army with the 55th Engineers, A. E. F. with whom he served a year in France. Since his return he has been active in Legion affairs, being twice commander of the local post. He is a republican by party affiliation.

"Before coming to Stephen he worked for County Attorney W. A. Blanchard, of Anoka county, gaining practical legal experience. He is 35 years old, born at Superior, Wis., a son of Ira W. Burhans, a lawyer of Holland Dutch extraction, and Helen Louise Hatch of New Hampshire Yankee blood. He comes of a family of lawyers, his maternal grandfather also being a lawyer. In 1917 he married Millie Christine Newhouse, of Norwegian extraction, and four children bless his home. His early life was spent in Superior, where he graduated from high school and worked in a law office.

"Burhans is plain-spoken, plain-acting, and works for the man that hires him. He has as good a legal training as the University of this state gives lawyers, and is a trial lawyer of promise."

Be sure that I will appreciate your help. If elected, I give my pledge to conduct the affairs of the County Attorneyship fairly and openly, giving consideration and a square deal to the rich and poor alike.

BRAGGANS
FOR
County Attorney

If you beleive I have made a fairly good County Attorney, I ask for your support

W. O. Braggans, the present County attorney, took office November 1, 1923, to fill the unexpired term of the late John R. Naeseth. He has conducted the affairs of his office with credit to himself and the County and is now a candidate to succeed himself. Mr. Braggans was born November 9th, 1876. He attended the public grade schools at Kingsville, Ohio, until 14 years of age, when he was obliged to leave school and seek work. He did not again attend school until he entered the law department of the University of Minnesota in 1898. Upon leaving the grade schools he worked in the nail mills and glass factories in and around Wheeling, W. Va., and in 1892 came west, settling at Milbank, S. D. He studied law in the office of Thos. L. Souck while working as a stenographer and was licensed to practice law in S. Dak., in 1898. That fall he entered the law department at the University of Minnesota, and graduated therefrom in the same class with Julius J. Olson of Warren, and was licensed to practice law in Minnesota in 1900. He immediately entered the employment of the Supreme Court as a stenographer and stayed there until appointed Court Reporter by Judge Grindeland of Warren in 1903, when he came to Warren, where he has since resided. He was married in 1901 to E. Letha McKenzie of Knox City, Mo., and they have three children, a girl now working in a law office in Chicago as a stenographer, and two boys now attending the public schools at Warren. Mr. Braggans is somewhat of a self-made man as indicted from the fact that he did not receive much schooling; he is industrious, capable and if re-elected will do his best to serve the interests of the people of the county.

For Representative in the Legislature From Marshall County

To the Voters of Marshall County:—

As it will be impossible for me to call on all of you personally, I take this method of reminding you that, having received the greatest number of votes of any of the candidates for Representative, at the June Primary, I am a candidate for re-election to the office of Representative for Marshall County, and also to thank you all for the splendid support and vote of confidence you gave me at the Primary Election.

If reelected, I pledge myself to devote my best efforts to the interests of my District and the State at large.

I am not asking for your support as the candidate of any Political Party, but, according to the Laws of Minnesota, as the candidate of the People of Marshall County. I believe that a Representative should be elected to represent the whole District instead of a particular Political Party. I believe that, with my experience and my friendship with the older members of the Legislature, I will be able to accomplish more than a new member can.

I stand for a fair deal for all the People, regardless of their business, occupation or political affiliation.

I believe that when the Legislature passes a Law and agrees to pay any institution or municipality certain State Aid, they should keep their promise by appropriating the money to pay it. I believe that the Mothers Pension and the Supplemental School Aid should be paid.

I believe that the Banking Laws of the State should be so amended as to give protection to the depositors; that there should be a sufficient amount taken from the Trunk Highway Fund, each year, to take care of the County Reimbursement Bonds and interest; that there should be such a division of the State School Funds as would give relief to the schools in districts where the taxable property valuation is lowest; that our Co-Operative Laws should remain inviolate so that our Co-operative Creameries, Poultry Associations, and any other Co-operative association, may continue to operate and be protected from the interference of out side interests; that any sound Legislation for the best interests of Agriculture should be enacted into Law.

Again thanking you for your support in the past and assuring you that I will endeavor to merit your support in the future, I remain,

"This is what our community can do! Everyone should read these Creamery Reports and do a little bragging to everyone he meets. Who do you think gets on best in the community—he who knocks or he who boosts? The man who takes things as they come and always hopes for a better future is the only person who is entitled to today's blessings." [Here a smile shot from ear to ear on Butter-Pete's face.]

"That reminds me of a story. An Irishman had fallen off a 14-story building. A man sitting at a window on the ninth floor heard the Irishman say as he went by, 'Begorry, I'm all right yet.' We should be like that Irishman.

"Human nature is queer. It seems to come so easy for us to believe the worst of the other fellow, perhaps because we recognize some of our own failings in him. It seems hard to say something good of others. And when some good is spoken, people take it as a matter of course and forget it; whereas evil is gleefully passed on and made 50 per cent worse in the telling. The worst of it is, people want to believe evil.

"Let us try to down these unnatural impulses when we speak of our creamery. Tell everyone of its good points. Tell us where improvements can be made."

At this point Butter-Pete said something about not caring to die before the age of Methuselah, but we didn't catch his exact meaning. The following about the election, however, was so good that we are repeating it: "The good citizen is the one who fastens the loose board and does not assist in tearing down more, and the one who uses his rights as an American citizen at every election. As an ex-service man and a member of the American Legion, I can't help but mention the fact that election time is soon here, a time when all good citizens should cast their votes. Half of us do not value our citizenship rights as much as we should. To me it means more and more each day. It is a sacred right to me and should be to all. We do not realize the power of the ballot when used intelligently. The only time I will fail to cast my ballot will be when I am dead and gone.

"It is my earnest wish that every one of you that can vote will do so on November 2nd."

FOR COUNTY TREASURER

To the Voters of Marshall County:

Having received the nomination for the office of County Treasurer, I come before you again for your consideration at the General Election on November 2, 1926.

As I realize that I am not very well known in some parts of the County, I think it is only fair to let you know who I am, and also my qualifications for the office. I am a graduate from one of the leading business colleges in this part of the country, and for a good many years past I have been bookkeeper and cashier in a large Department store, so I am well acquainted with office work.

I would like to make a personal call on every voter, but owing to the large territory to be covered, this will be impossible. I will therefore have to rely on my old and new friends for their support and for their votes on Election-day, November 2, 1926.

I shall sincerely appreciate whatever you do for me, and if elected I shall do my very best to serve the people and fulfill the duties of the office of County Treasurer carefully and impartially to all.

Respectfully yours.
PETER E. KVIKSTAD.

BORDEWICH REFUTES LAST-MINUTE STORIES

Last minute stories are now being circulated by two ladies traveling about the county in behalf of my opponent that I am a man without character, that I am a hard drinker, and that I have not perrormed the duties of my office. Such stories are without foundation and, being circulated at the last minute, are unfair to me as well as to the voters. I appeal to the fairness of the voters in this matter. My only means of reaching you at this late hour is thru the press. I submit herewith statements by respected citizens of the county.

Yours for FAIR PLAY,
JOHN P. BORDEWICH,
Candidate for Sheriff of Marshall County.

STATEMENT BY SHERIFF HANS C. HANSON

"No drinking man could work for me. Mr. Bordewich has at all times since he first became my deputy been a hard and consistent worker, honest in his dealings, and if his character had not been good I would not have kept him in my employ. I know of no other man that would go through the hardships he has gone through in the performance of his duties. My office has, as most people know, gone through very strenuous times in recent years and I know of no better man to carry on the work of enforcing the law in this county than Mr. Bordewich.

(Signed) HANS C. HANSON,
Sheriff of Marshall County, Minn."

STATEMENT BY REV. C. W. BLAKE, PASTOR FIRST METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, WARREN, MINNESOTA.

"I am glad to speak an appreciative word for Mr. Bordewich. The two years that I have been a pastor at Warren and have known Mr. Bordewich as deputy-sheriff I have found him a clean, sober, upstanding gentleman.

(Signed) CHARLIE W. BLAKE."

—9—

That detective was clever, he reflected. He had worked upon the simplest line imaginable; taken Cathewe's photograph and gone the rounds of the New York banks, and day before yesterday a teller and a cashier had recognized it. The son of Digby Hallowell!

When the dinner came to the coffee and cigar, the butler withdrew, and Mansfield sloped comfortably in his chair.

There is magic for some in coffee and tobacco. The stimulant is negatived by the narcotic; the thinking machine moves smoothly. There came into Mansfield's head a plan for the reconstruction of Bannister, through Betty.

To give the girl a free hand without creating a revolution. Somehow that appealed to his sporting blood. Cathewe out of the way, the spark in the powder-room would be extinguished.

But what did the child mean when she said she had the man in the hollow of her hand? Well, that puzzle would be explained away in the morning. She was her father's daughter. Under that grace of form, under that gentle tenderness and charity there was reinforcement of steel.

* * * * * * * *

Cathewe was anxious to have a little chat with Nancy before her guests began to arrive. He had telephoned her to this effect, and she had made the appointment at half after six.

"George Cottar, what in the world have you to say to me that's more important than my new dress?" she began.

"You've been puzzled regarding my conduct in relation to Miss Mansfield. Haven't you?"

"Yes. Are you going to tell me that you came here because you'd fallen in love with Betty—somewhere else?"

"I didn't suspect you were so keen, Nancy. But you've hit upon the truth. Mansfield told me I might pay court to his daughter upon the condition that I come to Bannister and become a force. I shan't go into those details now; some future date, perhaps."

"Do you want me to help you?" She reached over and laid her hand on his. "As between two friends?"

"Nothing but magic or black art could help me, Nancy."

"I'm not so sure," she replied, recalling that peculiar punctuation mark in his manuscript.

"It is not possible, Nancy. I came here because I loved her, at first sight, to find myself hoist 'twixt the devil and the deep blue sea. I had to fight her father. I had elected a certain way to go."

"'Loved I not honor more,'" quoted Nancy, softly. "Or is it that you fear your fate too much?"

"You are making fun of me?"

"No, Brand. I am very sorry. I understand. A miracle must happen."

"And there ain't no sech animal. The power of Mansfield's will had lain upon this town until it was pretty bad in spots. So I undertook to hammer into the public mind just how baneful his influence was. I don't suppose he himself realized to what depth he had fallen. I didn't awaken him. He has given me thunder for thunder. But contact with the beautiful mind of his daughter softened him gradually; and your father tells me that now Mansfield loves his daughter. And she is redeeming him.

"And I know positively that I have never been pointed out to her—as I shall be presently. I'm not going to hide any longer. So I have laid the dream away."

Nancy's heart gave a great bound. The bouyancy of hope! But she knew that there was a miracle close at hand. It rested upon her own lips. And yet why be silent and render all three miserable?

"A queer mess all around. The impulse of the moment is invariably a plunge for me. Love isn't something you may direct. You cannot say you will love this or that person."

"No," said Nancy.

"The bolt is blind. Often we love where we don't want to love. And that is my misfortune. I wrote her letters, Nancy. I do not know human nature. There is always something fascinating in the unknown. So I wrote her love letters, unsigned, to keep myself in her thoughts until I fulfilled the conditions of the bargain. Nancy, Bannister is going to be my home. It is the way out I've been seeking. No one shall rob the poor any more and leave them without redress. Oh, I know. It sounds like a boy's dream. But I have the power, Nancy, tremendous power for good. An honest newspaper—There goes the bell! "If you don't mind," he said, "I'll run away into the greenhouse. I want to fend off the denouement as long as possible. I wonder what in the world I'd have done without you, Nancy."

"Nonsense! You're a nice boy, and any girl ought to be pleased to have you around. I'll send for you."

The greenhouse had once been a long, rambling side porch. There were no orchids or potted orange trees; pansies and garden pinks and geraniums and a few roses. This was the doctor's playground.

There was an incandescent lamp at each end of the greenhouse; but where Cathewe sat there was only the dim light of the winter stars.

He heard a door close, then a light scurry of feet on the cement floor. An intrusion. He stood up. A woman was approaching the spot where he stood. No doubt she believed herself alone. She paused suddenly to inhale the perfume of the pinks. When she raised her head he saw who it was.

And Day Before Yesterday a Teller and a Cashier Had Recognized It.

* * * * * * * *

When the limousine drew up to the curb before the Maddox place, Betty did not alight at once. She stared through the window at the little house across the way. She wondered if, with a mother like that, she would have been the victim of her present unhappiness. She did not want laughter, jests, dancing; she wanted to sit beside that beautiful and remarkable woman while she played.

Upon entering the house she threw her arms around Nancy and kissed her; and. Nancy complimented her gaily upon the beauty of her gown. And both of them were passing through that singular phase of life which crystallizes the outlook and makes for misanthropy or tender philosophy.

"And she believes I am happy!" thought Betty.

"What shall I do?" thought Nancy. "How shall I act? To tell her that Brand wrote those letters would only add to the confusion, since he has built a Chinese wall between them."

Betty at once became encircled. Laughter began to bubble up in her. She wanted to be alone. It was so funny! She had set forth to wreak vengeance upon mankind for her hurt, and she could not begin even on these!

She could not remember how she reached it, but reach it she did—the door to the greenhouse. She remembered there were camp-chairs somewhere; and she walked down the little alley between the boxes and tubs, peering right and left. Raising her head, she saw the white expanse of a dress-shirt, quite close.

"I thought I was alone," she said.

"You say that with a shade of resentment. I was here first."

"Goodness! The ant-man!" She laughed. There was a note of hysteria in the laughter.

For a little while they stared at the stars—without seeing them.

Here, beside him, like this! And now he never could tell her; she would never know. In an hour or so she would learn the truth; and by her faith in her father she must hate and despise Brandon Cathewe.

Pits; no matter which way he turned he dug them. He became aware of a new twist in the many-faced irony of this adventure. He had risen to power in Bannister by the leverage of her father's misdeeds. Without this capital, the Herald would never have been roused from its moribund state.

Here, her shoulder almost touching his—the woman he loved! And the god of irony had whisked her as far away actually as if she had been transplanted upon Jupiter.

"Jupiter!" he said aloud, unthinkingly.

"And what about Jupiter?"

"Oh, I only want to go there and come back."

"With what?"

"A dream that has, I suspect, flown that far away."

"We do waste a good deal of time—wishing for things we cannot have."

"Do you?"

"I have, naturally, being human, like everybody else. What kind of a dream?"

"The most beautiful of all dreams."

Silence.

Still that baffling reserve, she thought. But this time he should not escape. Before they left the greenhouse she intended to ask him pointblank what his name was. A mystery here was utter nonsense.

"Your mother has fascinated me," Betty said suddenly.

"I am quite sure the fascination is mutual. She has done for you what she never does for strangers. You see, I am more or less familiar with her moods. Somehow you touched the flame and passion in her. She sensed the musician in you. You sing."

"You were there?"

"Yes, in the study. I apologize for not making my presence known. But I wanted to hear more of your singing, and was afraid you'd stop if I appeared."

"I shouldn't have minded—after the first song."

The door opened, and the Maddox' itinerant butler—the caterer's son—announced that dinner was served. As they reached the door, Betty turned upon Cathewe swiftly.

"I am Miss Mansfield, as you know. And you are—?"

Nancy herself saved the situation. She caught Betty by the arm and drew her aside. She turned to Cathewe.

"Miss Stoddard is waiting for you."

He nodded and hurried off.

"Betty, here is something I want you to read." Nancy put into Betty's hand a sealed envelope. "Under no circumstances open it until you are home. After you read it, telephone me what you think of it."

Betty folded the envelope and hid it in the bossom of her gown. She went into the dining room, angry and confused. Once seated, she saw that her unknown cavalier was directly opposite.

"Mr. Morrison, who is the gentleman opposite?"

"You don't know him? He is Brandon Cathewe, the editor of the Herald."

"I had pictured him quite a different sort," she said, evenly. "Will you present him before we leave the room?"

"If you wish it"—distressed.

The introduction took place after the other guests had left the dining room.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Early Newspapers Met Opposition of Church

The first newspaper was produced when written accounts of the imperial armies of Rome were sent to the generals in command in all parts of the provinces.

In 1566 the first official news sheets were published in Venice. They were written by hand and exhibited in public places. People paid the small coin of a gazzetta to read them. Hence the name. The church opposed the enterprise, and Pope Gregory even prosecuted the editors.

The oldest form of newspaper in England was in the beginning of the reign of James II—the so-called News-Letters, written by hand, and sent by post to subscribers in the country. In 1709 the first daily paper, the Daily Courant, was issued.

The oldest of the London daily papers, the Morning Chronicle, appeared in 1769. The Morning Post is the oldest of existing morning papers. Founded in 1772, it was followed about 1788 by the first daily evening paper, the Star.

The Times first appeared in 1788 as a continuation of the Daily Universal Register. Its originator and owner, Mr. John Walter, succeeded in 1814 in printing the Times by steam.

In 1845 the Daily News was founded, with the help of Charles Dickens. It was the first paper to lower its price from 6 pence to 3 pence, (12 to 6 cents).

The Right Thing!

Do you know why we shake hands? In early days man lived alone save for his woman back in the cave. He fought the wild animals alone and dragged home his loot alone. Men warred on one another for the most part. When primitive man was too weary to fight he would drop his club upon meeting another man in his path and hold out his empty hand to show that he was unarmed. And the extended hand warmed into the handtouch, then the handshake.

Today's form says that a person coming into a group does not offer to shake hands. It is up to the members of the group to make him welcome by offering the hand, if they care to.

Kite Carried Wire

The first wire rope used in 1852 in the suspension bridge across the gorge below Niagara falls was taken across the impassable waters of the rapids by the help of a kite flown over the boiling stream.

TWO FAMOUS WOMEN BORN IN SAME YEAR

Queen Victoria and Lydia E. Pinkham

MRS. ANNA McHENRY
1005 E. PLUM STREET, MARSHALL, ILLINOIS

In the year 1819, two babies were born whose lives were destined to have a far-reaching influence. One was born in a stern castle of Old England, the other in a humble farmhouse in New England.

Queen Victoria through her wisdom and kindliness during a long and prosperous reign has become enthroned in the hearts of the British people. Lydia E. Pinkham through the merit of her Vegetable Compound has made her name a household word in thousands of American homes.

Marshall, Illinois.—"After my second child was born, I never saw a well day for five years. My father was telling his druggist about my condition, and the druggist insisted that father take a bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and have me try it, as it had helped his wife. I had given up, but to please father and mother, I commenced taking your medicine and in a week I had begun to feel better. When I passed through the Change of Life, I was taking the Vegetable Compound and I had no trouble of any kind."—MRS. ANNA McHENRY, 1005 E. Plum St., Marshall, Illinois.

Another Woman Helped

Philadelphia, Penna.—Mrs. Caroline Nagy, of 2717 Sears St., in a recent letter to the Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co., says that after her child was born she was in a very weak condition. She could not seem to regain her health and went to her mother for advice. She told her to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, as it had helped her when in like condition, and it has helped her mother also. So Mrs. Nagy started taking it. She felt better after taking the first bottle,—after taking six bottles her weakness and other troubles disappeared, and she is never done praising the Compound.

In some families the fourth generation is learning the merit of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Attorney Ira H. Burhans

Candidate for

COUNTY ATTORNEY

Of Burhans, the Stephen Messenger, his home paper, says:

"Attorney Ira H. Burhans, candidate for county attorney, came to Stephen in January of 1918 to take over P. A. McClernan's law practice, and has actively engaged in the practice of law here since that time, except for 18 monhts service as a buck private in the army with the 55th Engineers, A. E. F. with whom he served a year in France. Since his return he has been active in Legion affairs, being twice commander of the local post. He is a republican by party affiliation.

"Before coming to Stephen he worked for County Attorney W. A. Blanchard, of Anoka county, gaining practical legal experience. He is 35 years old, born at Superior, Wis., a son of Ira W. Burhans, a lawyer of Holland Dutch extraction, and Helen Louise Hatch of New Hampshire Yankee blood. He comes of a family of lawyers, his maternal grandfather also being a lawyer. In 1917 he married Millie Christine Newhouse, of Norwegian extraction, and four children bless his home. His early life was spent in Superior, where he graduated from high school and worked in a law office.

"Burhans is plain-spoken, plain-acting, and works for the man that hires him. He has as good a legal training as the University of this state gives lawyers, and is a trial lawyer of promise."

Be sure that I will appreciate your help. If elected, I give my pledge to conduct the affairs of the County Attorneyship fairly and openly, giving consideration and a square deal to the rich and poor alike.

For Representative in the Legislature From Marshall County

To the Voters of Marshall County:—

As it will be impossible for me to call on all of you personally, I take this method of reminding you that, having received the greatest number of votes of any of the candidates for Representative, at the June Primary, I am a candidate for re-election to the office of Representative for Marshall County, and also to thank you all for the splendid support and vote of confidence you gave me at the Primary Election.

If reelected, I pledge myself to devote my best efforts to the interests of my District and the State at large.

I am not asking for your support as the candidate of any Political Party, but, according to the Laws of Minnesota, as the candidate of the People of Marshall County. I believe that a Representative should be elected to represent the whole District instead of a particular Political Party. I believe that, with my experience and my friendship with the older members of the Legislature, I will be able to accomplish more than a new member can.

I stand for a fair deal for all the People, regardless of their business, occupation or political affiliation.

I believe that when the Legislature passes a Law and agrees to pay any institution or municipality certain State Aid, they should keep their promise by appropriating the money to pay it. I believe that the Mothers Pension and the Supplemental School Aid should be paid.

I believe that the Banking Laws of the State should be so amended as to give protection to the depositors; that there should be a sufficient amount taken from the Trunk Highway Fund, each year, to take care of the County Reimbursement Bonds and interest; that there should be such a division of the State School Funds as would give relief to the schools in districts where the taxable property valuation is lowest; that our Co-Operative Laws should remain inviolate so that our Co-operative Creameries, Poultry Associations, and any other Co-operative association, may continue to operate and be protected from the interference of out side interests; that any sound Legislation for the best interests of Agriculture should be enacted into Law.

Again thanking you for your support in the past and assuring you that I will endeavor to merit your support in the future, I remain,

Yours truly,
—F. A. GREEN,
Candidate for Representative for Marshall County, in the 67th Legislative District.

BRAGGANS

FOR

County Attorney

If you believe I have made a fairly good County Attorney, I ask for your support

W. O. Braggans, the present County attorney, took office November 1, 1923, to fill the unexpired term of the late John R. Naeseth. He has conducted the affairs of his office with credit to himself and the County and is now a candidate to succeed himself. Mr. Braggans was born November 9th, 1876. He attended the public grade schools at Kingsville, Ohio, until 14 years of age, when he was obliged to leave school and seek work. He did not again attend school until he entered the law department of the University of Minnesota in 1898. Upon leaving the grade schools he worked in the nail mills and glass factories in and around Wheeling, W. Va., and in 1892 came west, settling at Milbank, S. D. He studied law in the office of Thos. L. Souck while working as a stenographer and was licensed to practice law in S. Dak., in 1898. That fall he entered the law department at the University of Minnesota, and graduated therefrom in the same class with Julius J. Olson of Warren, and was licensed to practice law in Minnesota in 1900. He immediately entered the employment of the Supreme Court as a stenographer and stayed there until appointed Court Reporter by Judge Grindeland of Warren in 1903, when he came to Warren, where he has since resided. He was married in 1901 to E. Letha McKenzie of Knox City, Mo., and they have three children, a girl now working in a law office in Chicago as a stenographer, and two boys now attending the public schools at Warren. Mr. Braggans is somewhat of a self-made man as indicted from the fact that he did not receive much schooling; he is industrious, capable and if re-elected will do his best to serve the interests of the people of the county.

Thos. Early Tells Amazing Story

Snatched Almost From Death's Door, Early Tells How Tanlac Saved Him.

Thomas H. Early, 1917½ Clark St., Omaha, Neb., gives most convincing account of his marvelous recovery.

"Before I took Tanlac," he says, "I had almost given up hope of recovering my health. I really thought I was 'through.' From morning till night I suffered pain. My nerves were so frazzled I could not sleep and terrible dizzy spells attacked me. Food caused hours of intense suffering; cold sweat would break out on my face.

"I want the world to know what Tanlac did for me. It rebuilt my health, banished all nervousness, indigestion and dizziness, put 20 lbs. of solid flesh on my wasted frame."

Tanlac, nature's remedy made from roots, barks and herbs usually relieves constipation, tones up sluggish liver, puts stomach in shape, vanquishes pain and builds strength. Take this wonder tonic and remedy. At your druggist's.

THROUGH A WOMAN'S EYES

By JEAN NEWTON

(©, by the Bell Syndicate, Inc.)

The Tyranny of Things

In his "Story of Mankind" Hendrick Van Loon says of the Greeks:

"The story of Greek life is a story of simplicity. 'Things,' chairs and tables and books and houses and carriages, are apt to take up a great deal of their owner's time. In the end they invariably make him their slave and his hours are spent looking after their wants, keeping them polished and brushed and painted. The Greeks, before everything else, wanted to be 'free,' both in mind and in body. That they might maintain their liberty and be truly free in spirit they reduced their daily needs to the lowest possible point."

And this reminds me of the time when I was a little girl, when a very rich lady who lived in a very large house with a great many servants remarked to my mother that she was going away to rest from her household duties. That appealed to my baby sense of humor. Six servants—and she needed a rest from household duties!

My mother tried to explain what I have long since discovered—that the larger her house and the greater the number of her servants, the bigger is a woman's job.

And so it is with most of the "things" we call luxuries. They tyrannize over us. Like the woman who must remain indoors on a beautiful day because the crystal closet must be washed or the hangings cleaned, most of us are in some measure under the tyranny of things.

Silver has to be constantly polished. Furniture must be dusted and kept shining. Jewels must be locked in strong boxes of which people are constantly losing the keys! Indeed, the tramp takes the lonely road with less care and a lighter heart than the woman who rides in a limousine bedecked with jewels on account of which she is in fear of her life.

It has been said that "Heavy lies the head that wears a crown," but not heavier than the man's whose bolted doors must guard valuables that invite thieves.

A woman whom I suspect of Greek ancestry made the remark the other day that with the glorious out-of-doors and so many wonderful and interesting things in life to enjoy, it is a crime that we must give so much time to simply "keeping the wheels going round"—the dressmaker and the hairdresser and the butcher, the baker, the candlestick maker, house, home and other routine.

The Greeks in their simplicity had the right idea.

The Art of Living

"I seem to be alright," a perfectly sane woman is known to have remarked, "when everything runs smoothly. But the moment anything happens to upset my routine my nerves get the better of me and I am completely floored."

I wonder whether she realized the significance of her confession!

"As long as things run smoothly"—anybody can get along. Then there is no need for initiative or competence or courage. The most helpless infant can get along and be "alright."

"As long as things run smoothly"—anybody can stay good natured. Then there is no need for poise or sacrifice or self-control. An enraged bull rushing downhill is harmless if no one gets in his path.

The test of us humans is how we handle the situations that do not run run smoothly—how we act in the face of disappointment, or hardship, or injustice.

Do we have poise, judgment, control? Do we retain our perspective and our own sense of justice?

Or are we "floored"—defeated before we begin? Do we run amuck, and, like the wild bull, make whoever happens to come in our path suffer for it?

When things go smoothly we are not "going along"—we are being carried along on one of the pleasant tributaries of the river of life.

But when the currents cross and we find ourselves in unfriendly waters, which, if we let them, would rush us to the deadly rapids, that is the time when we must keep our heads and strike out and swim—that is the time that tests our caliber.

And one thing we must all learn is that there is not one of life's tributaries, no matter how pleasant, that will carry us benignantly all the way to the sea. Just as there is no land road that is without snags, smooth all the way, so the kindest currents must sometimes cross and put us on our mettle.

We have all got to take the rough with the smooth and to know how to take the rough smoothly is the whole art of living.

Making Progress

Marion was a flirtatious young woman, and had been engaged many times, but at the age of thirty she was still unmarried. Two of her feminine friends were discussing her case. "It looks as if Marion is not making a very good running in the matrimonial race," one said. "Oh, I don't know about that," the other remarked. "I passed by her house last night, and looking in her living-room window I noticed that she is on her twelfth lap."

Infant Stows Away on Running Board

Minneapolis, Minn.—Minneapolis' youngest "running board runaway" is back home, not a bit the worse for an experience that might have cost his life.

He is Vernon, seventeen months old, son of Mr. and Mrs. Emil Solem. He rode for more than two miles along the city streets of Minneapolis, clinging with baby fingers to the side of a running board on which he lay sprawled.

The baby was playing when he spied a sedan parked in front of a nearby store. Toddling to the car, he climbed aboard. In a short time the driver, unaware that he had taken on a stowaway, started up. For more than two miles the sedan plied the streets before a pedestrian, seeing the youngster on the running board, shouted to the driver.

AMAZING ROMANCE OF DUAL IDENTITY

Girl Finds She Had Married Wrong Man.

Newark, N. J.—Suit for the annulment of her marriage to a man whom she had mistaken for a friend of her long past school days has been entered by "Mrs. Cyril Devine."

Miss Marion Wien and Cyril Devine had been childhood sweethearts for years. Then a lovers' quarrel separated them, and they saw nothing more of one another.

But Marion never forgot Cyril. She greeted him joyously when she met him one rainy day on a Newark street. At least she thought it was her old sweetheart, for the handsome man who smiled at her certainly resembled Cyril in every way.

So far as the man was concerned, he knew it was a case of mistaken identity. But Joseph Cordoza had fallen in love at first sight with the vivacious young woman who rushed up to him so impetuously. He wanted to know her better.

Cordoza, assuming the name of Cyril Devine, which the girl had given him, courted her assiduously and finally won her hand. A few weeks of bliss followed, and then Marion learned of her mistake. Her husband was arrested and confessed.

It was not until after he had been released and disappeared that Marion decided she had loved him for himself. Then it was too late. She could not find him, so she seeks a separation through law.

Finds His Wife Dead; Shock Cures Paralytic

Newark, N. J.—In the middle of a row of mean houses in Bergen street lived Mrs. Lena Tidar, seventy-two, and her seventy-four-year-old husband, Harry, deaf and paralyzed since weeks ago so that he was able only to drag himself, legs limp, from his bed to his kitchen chair.

From a deep slumber at six o'clock one morning the paralytic awoke to peer across the cluttered room and see to his surprise that his wife was lying awkwardly half off the little cot, not yet aroused although the hour for opening the grocery store in the front of the home had passed. Tidar pulled himself across to her body and in the dim light slapped her face gently to awake her in the belief she was asleep. She didn't move. His hand touched her cheek gently, curiously. It was cold.

The paralytic, unable to use his legs until that moment, swung crazily out of the house, shrieking, but walking upright for the first time in two weeks. He climbed the long outside stairs to the flat of Mrs. William H. Stevenson. There the woman found him, half an hour later, still standing upright and pounding vigorously.

Police came. They found Mrs. Tidar, suspected in the neighborhood of hidden wealth, had been murdered. A muslin bag had been twisted about her mouth and throat to stop the shrieks which could not penetrate her husband's deaf ears. But nothing had been stolen.

"I believe she died natural," Mr. Tidar kept insisting, and the police did not try to disillusion him.

Electrocution Threatens Extinction of Swallows

Berlin.—The swallows, so dear to the hearts of the German people that countless songs and poems have been dedicated to them, are reported to be on the verge of extinction.

The birds are being electrocuted by the thousands at "Swallows' Pass" in the Alps, which in recent years has been spanned by high-tension electric lines from the power plants of Lake Como. On their flights to and from North Africa the swallows rest on the wires, and in fluttering about in flocks frequently form a wing connection of two wires at the same time. Thousands of dead birds have been found in the caverns below.

MORE POWER AND SUPERIOR QUALITY

Pessimists

Mayor Walker, at a dinner in New York, said of a disgruntled group within the party:

"These men remind me of the bookkeeper's wife.

"The bookkeeper, you know, complained one evening, as he pushed away his untasted plate of mutton stew:

"'Gee, I wish I had an appetite for once!'

"'Oh, go on, George!' his wife said impatiently. 'What do you want an appetite for? It would only give you more dyspepsia.'"

Something To Feel Good About

Turn out two thirds of the lights in your home and you have practically the same light you had ten years ago at approximately the same price that you are now paying.

Light is almost synonymous with happiness. Even the humblest can now afford that which the richest could not have a century ago.

The manufacture of electric current has been so efficiently developed and the science of lamp making has advanced so that people are living in far brighter surroundings that they did even ten years ago.

Electric light companies are engaged in a thrilling race. Today one of them forges ahead with a new economy of machine or method and it is promptly adopted by all the rest. The goal toward which all are working is the same—to keep electricity cheap and the service reliable.

Since 1913, the average cost of living has gone up 65 per cent. but due to increasing efficiencies, the cost of electricity to the consumer has not followed the same trend to high levels of price.

POLITICAL ADV.

(Prepared and to be paid for at regular advertising rates by Levi G. Johnson, Argyle, Minnesota.)

Having received the nomination for County Auditorship at the recent Primary, I am now presenting myself before the voters of Marshall County as a clean and honest candidate, fitted for the work I seek. As reference, I wish to remind you of my home vote which was 7 to 1 in my favor.

The incumbent in office, who is my opponent in this race has held that position for a great period of years. Although I deem it reasonable and fair to give one good officer at least one complimentary term, I can see no reason for keeping a public officer indefinitely, or until disqualification, and can therefore frankly and conscientiously ask you to vote for me at this time, and if elected I will endeavor to merit your support by giving careful attention to the interests of my constituents, and discharge all duties without fear or favor, to the best of my ability. I will stand for economy as far as consistent with good system, and for complete publicity in all public affairs.

May I again ask you to give me the pleasure of County Auditor, to which I aspire.

Yours truly,
Levi G. Johnson,

A GHOST FROM THE PAST

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman.)

I

"SOME day you will go back to your own people," said Naulakha, kneeling beside Jim Starrett.

"If that time comes, you'll go with me," answered Jim. "But don't you be afraid, dearie. I guess there aren't many girls in the United States can hold a candle to you."

Naulakha looked at Jim searchingly, and sighed. She knew the history of such unions as hers. At first she had loved Jim with a passion that cast out all fear. But lately women in the settlement had been talking to her, frightening her. . . .

Naulakha was the daughter of a Russian trader and a woman of the Inlet tribe. She had been educated by the missionaries, who found her, spearing salmon, and took her from her mother's tent to rear. They had made a good woman of her, and a lady, after a fashion. The girl had lived happily among the missionaries until Jim came along, prospecting for gold.

When the missionaries refused to marry them, knowing what the result would be, Jim had taken the girl along with him. Now they were settled for the winter at Olifants, a tiny place within the circle, where never missionary had penetrated. It was impossible to marry her there, though Jim desired to do so, and the union was, under the circumstances, looked upon as valid by the settlers and their womenfolk.

When spring came Jim was going to take Naulakha south and marry her. He himself had been in Alaska five years. He had been educated at Yale and his father was a prosperous ranch owner in Oregon. There had been an unhappy love affair. Jim had been engaged to Dorothy for a year, and they had been very happy, only Jim fell into bad company. His father threatened to disown him. Dorothy broke off the engagement and announced her own to a neighboring ranchman, a man of good family, but much older than herself. Jim had gone North, vowing never to return. The girl's perfidy, as he considered it, had eaten into his soul, turning his mind to bitterness. In Naulakha he saw that simple happiness which he believed was not to be found in civilized lands. For five years he had not heard from anyone. The Indians called him "The Man Who Gets No Letters."

The women at the settlement had been talking to Naulakha, and had scared her. Day after day she watched Jim with furtive terror. He had always been kind to her, and they had been good comrades on their summer trips into the caribou lands. But she knew the call of the blood. Especially the girl dreaded the monthly arrival of the mail carrier in his dog-drawn sled. Then she trembled for fear that a letter would come for Jim. If once a letter came, she knew that all would be over.

But the winter drew to a close, and there was never a letter for Jim. Naulakha began to gather new courage. He had meant what he said, then. They were to start south with the break-up of the ice in May. When once they were married she would have no further cause for fear. Then nobody could take him away from her.

It was on the last mail day before their departure that the mail carrier stopped before their cabin.

"There's some mail for you, Jim," he said. "A regular bundle. I'm taking it to the post office now."

Jim started and looked around apprehensively. He knew Naulakha's terror. But the girl was not in the cabin, and he did not know that she had heard him, as she stood outside, holding one hand in panic against her heart.

"I'll go up, then," said Jim.

Naulakha watched him depart. It was a long time before he returned. When he did he had a bundle of letters in his pocket and was reading one in his hand. As he entered the cabin he thrust the letters away.

That meal was a silent one. That night Naulakha cried herself—not to sleep, but into an apathetic daze. She knew Jim was only pretending to sleep. In the morning they faced each other like strangers.

"Dearie," said Jim at last, "do you think you could stand waiting for me a month or six weeks in Nome?"

"Yes, I suppose so," said Naulakha.

"You see," Jim hastened to explain, "I got a letter yesterday. Didn't want to scare you about it, but I guess you're brave enough to stand for it. My father's dead, and I've got to go to Oregon and settle up his affairs. I'll be back on the next boat, and then we'll have the time of our lives."

Naulakha looked at him very solemnly. "You will marry me in Nome, Jim?" she asked.

"Sure," said Jim.

But he did not marry her, because he had only just time to catch the boat.

His last impression of her was of a pathetic little figure waiting upon the wharf, looking after the departing ship.

II

Dorothy rested her cheek against her husband's shoulder.

"Are you quite, quite sure that you didn't fall in love with any of the women in Alaska?" she demanded.

"Quite sure," said Jim, patting her forehead.

Resolutely he had put Naulakha out of his life. When the letters arrived, telling him that his whereabouts were known, and that his father was dead, Jim had resolved to return by the next boat. But there had been a letter from Dorothy awaiting him at Nome, announcing that her engagement had never come to marriage, and telling him that she still loved him. At first he had laughed scornfully; but as the miles of sea intervened between himself and Nome, Dorothy had changed from a shadow to a reality, and Naulakha had become the merest phantom. He was like a man who awakens out of a dream.

He had not written. But he had sent Naulakha a sum of money through a friend. When Naulakha received it she knew what it meant.

She waited all summer. Of every stranger who arrived she inquired concerning Jim. Some lied to her, some jested; those who knew lied, and those who did not know either joked or put her off with vague assurances. It was in September, when the last boat arrived without Jim that the resolution which had been growing throughout the summer crystallized.

The outgoing boat would call a day later. Then there would be no more traffic that season. Naulakha took her possessions, her money, closed the cabin and took passage for Portland.

Ignorant as she was, she somehow managed to find Jim's ranch. It was located not far from the city. Nobody who saw her imagined who she was. She had her mother's swarthy complexion, but her father's Caucasian features. She passed for a Syrian or an Italian.

III

"Jim, dearest!"

Jim looked up from the table, where he was going over the accounts.

"There's a Syrian woman at the door who says she wants to see you. What shall I do?"

"Buy some lace from her and send her away."

"She hasn't any lace to sell, dear. She wants to see you. I can't make her out."

"Probably wants a job for her husband on the ranch. Let her come in, Dolly."

Dorothy opened the door. In the lamplight Jim saw the features of Naulakha, looking at him out of a sort of hazy cloud. Behind the cloud Jim saw dimly the icebound, glacier-covered slopes, and the stunted pine forests where the caribou roamed. He remembered the past, those sweet days of companionship upon the hills, those nights together in the cabin. For a moment he was back again with Naulakha in the old days.

"What do you want?" he gasped.

"I want my husband," said Naulakha slowly.

Jim saw the first shadow of doubt cross Dorothy's face. She went up to the stranger.

"Who is your husband?" she asked. "He is not here. Are you ill? It there anything I can do for you?"

Naulakha's glance roamed from the one to the other. "Are you married to him?" she asked.

"Of course I am," said Dorothy, bridling.

"And you are happy together?"

Dorothy looked at her intently; then she took the girl's hands in hers. "Yes, we are very happy," she said soothingly.

"And you—you are happy?" asked Naulakha of Jim.

"I am happy," said Jim, in a voice which he did not recognize.

"That is all," said Naulakha, moving toward the door. But Dorothy sought to detain her.

"You must stay, you are ill," she said. "Your husband has left you, perhaps?"

"Yes, he has left me, but I must go," answered Naulakha, and in another moment she was gone in the darkness.

Dorothy came back to Jim.

"She is out of her mind, poor thing," she said. "How unhappily she looked at us. Do you think we ought to do anything for her, dear?"

"No," said Jim brokenly. "There is nothing that we can do."

Paint Two Pictures of First Vanderbilt

Chroniclers of the career of Cornelius Vanderbilt, founder of the Vanderbilt fortune, differ in their views of his character. One biographer relates that Vanderbilt superintended personally the construction of every boat in his fleet, had a perfect practical knowledge of the business in its every detail, selected his captains well and paid them justly and never lost a vessel by fire, explosion or wreck. He possessed in a remarkable degree the talent of choosing the right man for a place and of inspiring him with zeal. A later writer declares he drove his competitors out of business by sheer harshness and unscrupulousness, was severe with the men who worked for him, compelling them to work long hours for little pay, and showed a singular ability in undermining competitors and then, having obtained a monopoly, to charge exorbitant rates.—Boston Post.

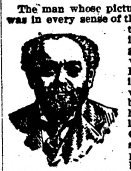
Uncharitable

"The world's a small place," said the bore. "Now, just listen to this: Last year in Paris I met a man who lives in the next road to me. Later I met him in Venice, then in Rome, again in Alexandria, and finally I crossed the channel with him. What d'you think of that?"

"Why on earth didn't you pay him what you owed him in the first place?"—London Answers.

Helpfulness to Others Man's Great Achievement

The man whose picture appears here was in every sense of the word helpful to mankind, as it was he who gave to the world Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription which has brought restored health to countless women. One of them says: "For the past 20 years I have taken Dr.



Pierce's Favorite Prescription off and on whenever I felt the need of a tonic and it has never failed to build me up in health in a short time. Usually two or three bottles are sufficient. I believe it is the best tonic weak women can get."—Mrs. Ed. Sampson, 204 W. Second St., Winona, Minn.

What would you do with a million dollars inherited unexpectedly? When this happened to Cornelius Sullivan, Boston insurance collector at $80 a week, he bought a $50,000 home for his parents, says Capper's Weekly. Then he bought an auto for each of his five brothers and sisters. For himself he bought a ticket for a tour around the world. When he returns he will go back to his insurance job and keep on living a simple life.

After an older sister had called loudly for him, Richard came strolling into the yard.

Overdoing?

Hurry, Worry and Overwork Bring Heavy Strain.

MODERN life throws a heavy burden on our bodily machinery. The eliminative organs, especially the kidneys, are apt to become sluggish. Retention of excess uric acid and other poisonous waste often gives rise to a dull, languid feeling and, sometimes, toxic backaches and headaches. That the kidneys are not functioning perfectly is often shown by burning or scanty passage of secretions. More and more people are learning to assist their kidneys by the occasional use of Doan's Pills—a stimulant diuretic. Ask your neighbor!

How Sally Improved John

By RICHARD COE

(Copyright.)

"BIG red ears that stick out—horn-rimmed spectacles—a pinch-back suit—and a foolish grin."

Sally Richart gave a last touch of the comb to her smart red bob and moved aside from the dressing-room mirror to make way for her friend.

"He's simply awful," she continued while she waited for Winnie to make herself beautiful. "And I'm so sick of the men around this place—I did hope that McNamara would get something worth while in the way of a bookkeeper as long as he fired poor, old Jamieson; but this thing—my gracious, he's terrible!"

The two girls, returning from their luncheon, locked arms and strolled back to the office.

"There he is—" said Sally with a clutch at Winnie's arm. The girls moved loftily by the young man coming down the hall. He looked at them shyly and hopefully but their glances passed over him as though he had been a lamp-post, nevertheless each itemized exactly the points already noted: ears certainly rather large and pink—spectacles—a last year's suit—and the friendly, eager smile.

From the top of her head to the sole of her foot Sally was as trim and smart as a fashion-plate, and she hated shabby, stupid people. Sally was a clever, pretty girl and she meant to get on. She had a gift of mimicry and scarcely a day passed that she did not have something new to tell of the ridiculous ways of John Hendricks, the new bookkeeper. Jeering laughter ran about the office like a darting flame whenever he came out of his inner office. But Hendricks never knew they were laughing at him.

Poor Hendricks had a slavish desire to please and hold his job and the girls specially despised him when they found out he was doing old Jamieson's work at half his pay.

He hung around at lunch time to be invited to lunch with some of the boys, but nobody asked him—Sally's jeers had reached them, too, and they thought him a "sap" of the worst sort. He had been in the office two months and nobody knew where he lived or anything about him—and nobody wanted to.

Then one day he had a bright idea—he thought about it all the week and on Saturday he kept putting his hand in his pocket to feel the little white envelope there.

It was a quarter to twelve and all the girls, freshly combed and powdered, were waiting for the welcome twelve strokes that would release them for the half holiday, when Hendricks marched out of his office with an even larger and more amiable smile than usual.

"I've got two tickets for a matinee," he announced, "who'll go with me?" and waited for the rush.

Nobody answered, and Hendricks turned to the nearest girl, but she hurriedly said she had an engagement—and that engagement proved contagious—everybody had it. "Nobody would admit now that they weren't dated up," thought Sally shrewdly.

But Hendricks' smile began to fade and he grew a little white. Suddenly it occurred to Sally that his eyes had the look of a friendless dog, stoned and driven from every door. A sudden fury seized her at the shuffling girls and their covert smiles. Her cheeks flushed, and, as the boy got to the end of his painful circle, she stepped forward. "Why don't you ask me, Mr. Hendricks? I haven't got an engagement," she said.

A half-suppressed shriek of laughter went up around them but Sally scarcely noticed it, she was so amazed by the joy and gratitude that shone in John Hendricks' eyes. "I wanted to ask you most of all," he said later, "but I didn't dare."

When he took her to a cafeteria for lunch and marched her up to rear balcony seats, Sally wondered why she had done it. "I must have been crazy," she thought. But before the play began and during the intermissions John Hendricks told her his simple history. He had never gone anywhere with a girl before. His mother had been a widow and an invalid, and Sally saw a picture of the boy who went to work at fifteen and did most of the housework at night. Working in night classes after a day's toil left him no leisure, and he certainly had no money for pleasure. Now his mother was dead, he told her huskily, and he was alone. But, of course, he had a good job and he was going to work for promotion.

"Are you crying at the show?" he asked anxiously, "don't you think it's funny?"

"It's a perfect scream," she answered promptly.

One of the girls did not turn up at the office on Monday, and it developed that she was ill. When she got better she took another job and it was a year later that she met Winnie.

"How is everybody? she demanded, and when that was answered: "Is the old gang still at the office? That dumb Hendricks, is he still there, working for promotion?"—

"Oh, no," said Winnie, "he's gone. You know Sally Richart took him in hand and started to improve him. She made him cut his hair so his ears didn't show so much, and wear rimless glasses, and buy some decent clothes, and then she improved him out of his job into a better one—now she's got him so much improved that she's going to marry him."

Not Welcome

Marjorie did not like the idea of a new baby brother. When her mother returned home from the hospital their meeting was a joyful one, and as Marjorie settled herself on the bed for a happy chat she noticed the little stranger on the other side of her mother.

With a small forefinger pointed at the unwanted playmate, Marjorie demanded, "When is that hospital baby going back to the hospital?"

Baby's Hair
Be Careful How You Wash It

Baby's hair is too soft and fine to withstand the harsh effects of soaps and ordinary shampoos. That's the reason why Marcelle Lemon Shampoo is most often recommended for babies' and children's hair. This mild shampoo cleans the hair perfectly, yet leaves it soft, silky and easy to manage—never dry and brittle. It also acts as a gentle stimulant to the scalp, thus promoting a healthy, natural hair growth. If you want your baby to have beautiful hair all through life, start washing its hair regularly with Marcelle Lemon Shampoo. Note the marked improvement after two or three shampoos with this amazing new liquid.

HOW THE PILGRIM MOTHER Kept Her Family in Good Health

A statue to the Pilgrim Mother was recently unveiled at Plymouth Rock, Mass. Through her we honor every pioneer woman who endured privation and hardships that a nation might live. Shoulder to shoulder with her husband she built a home in the wilderness and reared her sturdy sons and daughters. She cooked and sewed. She spun and wove for her growing family and when they were ill, she brewed potent remedies from roots and herbs—such roots and herbs as are now used in Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

A Massachusetts woman writes:

"I was all run-down, with no ambition. I was tired all the time. Sometimes I would be in bed two or three days at a time, and the doctor would have to give me something to quiet me. A friend told me about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and I have had wonderful results from it. I felt better after taking the second bottle, and I am never without it in the house now. I have told lots of people about it, and they say it helps them, too. I am willing to answer letters from women asking about the Vegetable Compound."—Mrs. J. W. Critchett, 2 Hammond Street, Cambridge, Mass.

The Admonition of Age

Dick possessed a tennis racquet, which, thought it had been classed as "junk" by on older sister, was the envy of the youngsters of the neighborhood. The neighborhood gang was assembled in the back yard one day and little Mary, five, grabbed the tennis racquet and said: "Throw the ball, Richard, and I'll bat it."

Nancy, her sister, and the senior by three years, felt it necessary to correct little Mary, so she yelled: "You don't say bat it, silly, say tennis it!"

Salts Fine for Aching Kidneys

When Back Hurts Flush Your Kidneys as You Clean Your Bowels

Most folks forget that the kidneys, like the bowels, sometimes get sluggish and clogged and need a flushing occasionally, else we have backache and dull misery in the kidney region, severe headaches, rheumatic twinges, torpid liver, acid stomach, sleeplessness and all sorts of bladder disorders.

You simply must keep your kidneys active and clean and the moment you feel an ache or pain in the kidney region begin drinking lots of water. Also get about four ounces of Jad Salts from any good drug store here, take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys will then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and is intended to flush clogged kidneys and help stimulate them to activity. It also helps neutralize the acids in the urine so they no longer irritate, thus helping to relieve bladder disorders.

Jad Salts is inexpensive; makes a delightful effervescent lithia water drink which everybody should take now and then to help keep their kidneys clean.

A well-known local druggist says he sells lots of Jad Salts to folks who believe in trying to correct kidney trouble while it is only trouble.

CHAPTER IX

—10—

"Mansfield Comes Home."

Betty and Cathewe stood alone, facing each other for a moment.

"Suppose we return to the greenhouse?" she suggested.

He led the way, closing the door gently. "I have tried to avoid this moment, but it was inevitable."

"Why do you hate my father?"

"I do not hate him. We have different ideals."

"I was just beginning to like you!"

"And now?"

"Oh, I don't know! Something dreadful seems to have happened to me. Has my father ever wronged you or yours?"

"No."

"Then why do you attack him?"

He was silent.

"I love my father, and he loves me. He will not stoop to defend himself from calumny. Different ideals! My father has made this city prosperous. What have you, an outsider, done?"

"Not an outsider, just an outcast," he answered.

"Well, I'll give you a surprise. After January first you will no longer direct the policies of your despicable newspaper."

"And what miracle will happen to prevent me?"

"It has already happened. At this moment I control the majority of the stock." The level quality of her tones was Mansfield-ian—cold and implacable.

As he was trying to comprehend the significance of this there came a series of rumbles like thunder in the distance. The greenhouse trembled, and there was the crisp tinkle of falling glass. Instinctively both of them wheeled and stared through the glass at the sky in the east. They saw it grow lurid then sharply ruddy.

"The munitions," he gasped. And ran toward the door.

* * * * * * *

When the cub reporter fell in a faint on the paper-littered floor of Cathewe's office, Cathewe became affected by a strange tightness in his throat. He fell to musing upon the elusive human attribute called loyalty.

"Say, chief," he whispered, "there's something I've got to tell you."

"Well, what have you done?"

"The other day they sent me on a fake interview with Mansfield. Of course, I was kicked out. So this morning I cut out all the news stories and editorials concerning him and mailed them to Miss Mansfield, with an unsigned note that everything was true. Well, the moment I dropped the stuff in the post office, I got cold feet. I tried to get it back, but there was nothing doing. I'm horribly sorry."

"So am I," said Cathewe, gravely.

"All right; I'm fired."

"No. What you did tonight squares that. You're going on the payroll at twenty a week. There's a taxi for you below."

Cathewe called to the city room for someone to help the boy to the cab; and as soon as this was done, the harried editor fell to pacing.

The old man of the sea was still on the shoulders of Digby Hallowell's son, he thought. He would have to start all over again, somewhere, somehow, thanks to the efforts of Miss Mansfield. He would sell the little home and turn back the proceeds to his mother. And what would she do—return to Florence or follow his future fortune?

"Ah, Matthews!" he cried, as a man about his own age came in. "Give me the gist of it. I've been holding up the editorial page for two hours."

"Five dead and forty-seven injured. The biggest story that ever struck this town, Mr. Cathewe, and there is a phase to it I just don't know how to handle. I want your view first."

"What is it?" asked Cathewe.

"Mansfield and that stunning girl of his. That girl goes sailing out there in her dinner gown and turns her big limousine into an ambulance, and makes twelve trips to the hospitals.

"The place was totally wrecked. Four tanks of T. N. T.—you know we had four separate fields of them, so that if an accident happened to one field, the others would be immune—the four fields exploded simultaneously. The girl is in the city hospital—"

"Hurt?"

"No. Just watching at the side of her father's cot. Seems Mansfield was out there inspecting the work on the pipeline when the place blew up. He wasn't touched, but he hung around, giving orders."

"But the hospital!"

"I'm coming to that. What he did was as brave a thing as might happen in France. One side of his face will be badly scarred and his left hand crippled. Dashed into a blazing shack for three Slav kiddies that had been deserted by their terror-stricken father. Coming out, the door frame fell upon him. But he staggered through, into the safety zone. He was badly burned, but the kiddies escaped with nothing more serious than singed hair."

"And then?"

"Not a sound from that crowd! First-off, that struck me as rather hard and cruel. But I got the rights of it shortly. Stunned. When they awoke, he was on his way to the city hospital. Looks to me, chief, as if our capital has suddenly been wiped out. We can't jump on the old freebooter hereafter."

"Thank God for that!" said Cathewe. "I'd like nothing better than to go up there and shake his good hand."

"Then the lid is off?"

"Squeeze all you can out of the story. Let the town realize that Dunleigh Mansfield has come home."

"Here's the real climax. The girl carried eleven men to the Good Shepherd. When she got there with the twelfth, there wasn't room. So she had to take the man to the city hospital. She saw to it that the man was given the best aid obtainable. When they had got him all swathed up in cotton, she chanced to turn toward the next cot—and there lay her father!"

Cathewe caught his star man by the shoulders and pushed him from the room. He himself had work to do. He sat down and wrote the editorial which was talked about long after the fire was forgotten. This editorial was headed: "Mansfield Comes Home."

CHAPTER X

The Truth.

Betty, who had slept in the chair beside her father's cot, spread out the Times and with heavy eyes scanned the black headlines.

"Daddy!" she cried exultantly. "You're a hero! The whole town is talking about your deed. Listen." She began reading the account.

"What paper is that?" he asked.

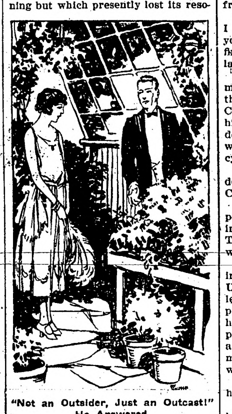
"The Times."

"Get a Herald and see what that paper has to say."

She obtained one and opened the newspaper to page four. "There is an editorial here," said Betty.

"Read it to me."

When she had done—with a voice that had been strong at the beginning but which presently lost its resonance and broke frequently toward the end—the paper slipped from her hands to the floor and she stared across the row of cots.



"Not an Outsider, Just an Outcast!" He Answered.

"I don't understand," she said, addressing nobody in particular. "Daddy, I bought the controlling interest in the Herald yesterday morning. And last night at Nancy's I told Mr. Cathewe that his successor would be appointed in January."

The light in Mansfield's eye broke into many little points, and the lids worked rapidly. "Betty, you have met him?"

"Twice, accidentally. He remained unknown until last night. He—he said he warred against you because your ideals were different."

"That was sportsmanlike. What do you propose to do with the paper?"

"I don't know now. I don't suppose I had any plans mapped out for the future. I just wanted the attacks against you stopped. He says you have come home. What does he mean by that?"

"I'll mull it over and tell you what I think of it this afternoon. You run along home, and climb into bed. You're about done, honey. And I'll be rested, too, when you get back."

"I am tired. But there is something I—must tell you—before I leave. For more than three years I have been receiving letters. Love-letters, daddy. I can speak now, because the affair has come to an end. When I go up to the house I shall destroy those letters."

"A writer—with a little money," whispered Mansfield, his gaze directed toward the ceiling.

Betty arrived home and went to her room. As the maid was helping her to undress, a crumpled envelope fell to the floor. Betty suddenly recollected that it was the letter Nancy had given her. She started to rip open the end, but desisted. Both her body and mind seemed drugged.

"Call me at one promptly," she said, as her head touched the pillow.

Four hours later she awoke, refreshed and saw the mail on the bedstand. She reached for it. Fate decided that she should open the large envelope first. Newspaper clippings. She caught a single line in the top clipping—"The Lord of Polygon Hill Is Always Safely Within the Law."

One by one Betty read them, now burning with fury, now cold with implacable hate. She came to the last clipping. It was the story of an inventor whom her father had betrayed and permitted to die a pauper; a terrible narrative of the ruthlessness of business, of the callosity of self-interest. And yet she knew it could not be true.

The truth! To whom might she go? Not to her father in his present critical condition. . . . Maddox! She flung herself out of bed and ran to the extension telephone. Yes; he could give her a few minutes, but he was hard pressed. Finally he arrived.

She pushed him into a chair and laid the clippings on his knee. "Read them," she said.

He pretended to glance over them. "Yes; all these things are true, little lady. But what your father did last night cleans the slate, in the eyes of God as well as man. You baby! Don't you dare sit in judgment on your father at this moment."

"And I—I have misjudged Brandon Cathewe?"

"I'll tell you. A few hundred years ago he would be wearing a surtout with a cross on it and he would be outside the wall of Jerusalem. I loved that boy. I wish God had given me a son like him. And your father admires him secretly. He tried to avoid you because he didn't want you to know him as he is. It would have made you doubt your father. You have met his mother. He couldn't be very bad with such a mother. He misjudged you, too. He thought you had deserted France, that you were only a giddy butterfly."

"Whereas—I am an ant. Who is he, really? From where does he come?"

"There's only one way to find that out. Go to his mother."

"Go to his mother," repeated Betty, dreamily. "But I am keeping you from your patients!"

"I'm mighty glad you called me in. I don't know who could have mailed you those clippings, but he's done a fine service for us all. Good-by, little lady. And remember!"

After the doctor had gone Betty remained motionless for a space. A new thought had occurred to her. Brandon Cathewe. She would give him back his newspaper. Having come to this decision, she returned to her room. It was then she espied once more Nancy's letter. This time she opened it.

She had to approach a window to decipher this scrawl: "From George Cottar to Nancy Maddox, his friend."

It came to her, upon this second perusal, that the handwriting though in pencil, was strangely familiar. Then she came upon a little cross where a period should have been.

There fell upon her senses a roaring like the falling of mighty waters. Until this died away, she was powerless to move. When she could impart mobility to her feet, with her heart fluttering wildly she ran to the precious Florentine box. She opened a letter and laid it beside the sheet of manuscript. The same hand had written them both.

Immediately she flew out of the house and rushed off to Nancy's.

"Oh, Nancy! Where can I find him?"

"You want father?"

"No, no! I want George Cottar—the man who wrote those letters!"

Nancy led the way into the living room and stopped only when she reached a window from which the street was to be seen.

"What do you see from this window?" she asked.

"From here? I seem to be very stupid, for I don't see anything."

"See, then, that temple of fine dreams and music—the little white house with the picket fence. For the man who wrote those letters to you, and George Cottar, and Brandon Cathewe—they are one, Betty. Why don't you go over?"

"All right, I will," answered Betty and with the impetuosity of ardent youth she again dashed out of the house.

Betty crossed the street, opened the gate and latched it behind her, and approached the fateful door.

Mrs. Cathewe came forward and, with that interpretative insight which was the quality of her genius, gathered the girl in her arms.

When they were seated upon the divan, Betty locked her fingers tightly and began.

"I did not know until last night that he was the editor of the Herald. I was very stupid through it all. Then last night at Nancy's the truth came out. I was hard and bitter to him. I did not know then that my father—"

A hand flew toward her lips. "You shall not say it!" cried Mrs. Cathewe. "Your father was magnificent last night. You should have heard sonny praise you both. He was happy over it."

"Happy!"

"Yes. A phase of his task has come to a happy ending. We can leave Bannister now, content."

"Leave Bannister?—because I told him that after January he—No, no! He shall have his newspaper back.

"Did—did he ever tell you about some letters he wrote to me?"

"Yes. Between sonny and me there are no secrets."

"Did he mean what he wrote?" asked Betty, miserable with shame.

Auto Smashup

While returning home from Thief River Falls last Thursday evening, George Hanson had the misfortune to have his Chevrolet sedan badly smashed up when a big touring car driven by a party from Thief River Falls collided head-on with him on the Jefferson highway a short distance north of Steiner. Both cars were badly damaged, and had to be towed into Thief River Falls to be repaired.

No one was hurt in the accident, although Mr. Hanson's car turned on its side on top of the grade, and the other car took the ditch after the collision.

Rum-Runner Caught After Shooting Man

Emery Smith, of Chicago and Fargo, a notorious rum-runner, was caught last Wednesday afternoon in Thief River Falls after a shooting-match in which Severn Brandon, manager of a lumber company in that city, was injured.

Brandon had just entered his car, which was standing in front of the postoffice, when Smith entered the car from the other side. Smith pulled a Colt 45, saying he wished to be driven to Holt.

Brandon said that he would have to get gas before he could go, but Smith poked the gun into his body and said, "Don't try any of that stuff with me or I'll plug you!"

Police Crown, across the street, waved to Brandon just then, and Smith saw, and fired. The bullet entered Brandon's right leg just below the knee, coming out at the ankle on the opposite side.

Smith decided to run, but Brandon grabbed the gun before he got away. Smith ran through Borry's garage and into the alley, where he was captured by Crown. He attempted to overpower the Chief, but others took a hand, and he was jailed.

Brandon was taken to a hospital for treatment.

Smith was given five years at Stillwater.

And that's that.

Now that the election is over, the Socialists are beginning their insidious work. At least, that's the way it seems, from all the "socials" that are going on.

SCHOOL NOTES

The Seventh and Eighth grade classes have made their own notebooks for keeping their daily assignments.

The Eighth Grade Arithmetic class is studying stocks, bonds, and brokerage. Newspapers and New York stock quotations are used to illustrate the above.

A new plan has been adopted to take care of disorderly conduct and poorly prepared assignments. Each pupil has a number. Whenever his number appears on the board he is required to see the teacher and proper punishment is meted out.

A Science table suitable for all sciences taught in any high-school, has been recently installed and will be innovated soon by the Biology class. From time to time more science equipment will be added to make this department complete.

All the books in the library have been classified according to the classification recommended by the State Supervisor of School libraries. Many old books have been discarded and approximately two hundred and fifty books will be added within the next three weeks. This will bring our library up to the standard.

SOME DANCERS!

MissSwenson—Tell about the nature of the Indians.

Gaya—At home they are quite civilized but at their war-dances they are all up in the air.

The students in the English IV class have been outlining the four periods of English literature.

Recently a representative of the Curtis Publishing Co. visited our school and introduced a campaign for selling subscriptions to the Saturday Evening Post, the Country Gentleman, and Ladies' Home Journal. Two teams were organized under Mildred Peterson and Gaya Johnson, with Dennis Wegge as business manager. Each person selling three or more subscriptions received appropriate prizes. The campaign lasted one week. At the end of that time the school distinguished itself by proudly presenting sixty-seven dollars to the business manager. The side receiving the most subscriptions were the "Pirates" under the leadership of Mildred Peterson, so it became evident that the losers, the "Sea Dogs," must exert their mental powers in devising some form of entertainment for the "Pirates".

The Sea-Dogs immediately busied themselves in sending out invitations to the Pirates. On Friday, Oct. 29, the doors between the fifth and sixth, and seventh and eighth grade rooms were thrown back, seats pushed back, and a general clearing out took place in preparation for the evening revel.

We spent the evening in playing games, and at eleven o'clock a delicious lunch was served by the Sea Dogs. After the "feed" the prizes were given out by Mr. Vieths, after which the party "adjourned". Everyone voted it a jolly good time for a first party. We hope we may have many more!

Girl Found Hanging

A fatal step may end the most happy life. The most cultured, refined, most beautiful, and best loved are no exception to this fate. A father's devotion, a mother's fond care and love, or a brother's or sister's companionship will not shield them when they desire to take the step.

Such was the illustration last evening when one of the highest educated, most refined and vivacious girls was found hanging in the home parlor, surrounded by all the luxuries that go to make a happy life.

Late in the evening she was missed, and careful failed to reveal her whereabouts. The telephone was used without results. Her friends were called to help search for her.

Finally the almost heartbroken mother returned to the parlor, and there, to her horror and surprise, she found her beloved girl hanging.

How must the mother been affected by the sight which met her eyes!

There was the daughter, hanging to her sweetheart's neck, begging him to subscribe to the home paper!—Worthington Globe.

THRILLS APPLENTY IN VALENTINO FILM

Entertainment is stressed in "The Eagle," Rudolph Valentino's latest picture which is to be shown here tonight.

The romantic star is seen for the first time as a Russian—in garb more picturesque than any he has previously worn. His first appearance is as a Cossack lieutenant, than as the bandit who became known as the Eagle because of his swift, mysterious movements.

The star is supported by a large and distinguished cast, including Vilma Banky, the Hungarian blonde whose beauty and ability have caused even blase Hollywood to gasp; and Louise Dresser, for many years a star of musical comedy.—See it tonight at the Community Hall.

Little Bobby Sandberg Has Unfortunate Accident

Bobby Sandberg, youngest son of Mr. and Mrs. C. L. Sandberg, had the misfortune to have his head squeezed badly while playing in their cow-barn on Sunday. He was chasing a kitten in one of the stalls when a cow pushed him against the side of the stall, crushing his head so badly that he started to bleed thru one of his ears. He was at once rushed to a hospital at Thief River Falls where he spent a few days under doctor's care.

Mrs. Sandberg stayed with him while he was there.

Clean Kidneys By Drinking Lots of Water

Take Salts to Flush Kidneys if Bladder Bothers or Back Hurts

Eating too much rich food may produce kidney trouble in some form, says a well-known authority, because the acids created excite the kidneys. Then they become overworked, get sluggish, clog up and cause all sorts of distress, particularly backache and misery in the kidney region, rheumatic twinges, severe headaches, acid stomach, constipation, torpid liver, sleeplessness, bladder and urinary irritation.

The moment your back hurts or kidneys aren't acting right, or if bladder bothers you, begin drinking lots of good water and also get about four ounces of Jad Salts from any good pharmacy; take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to flush clogged kidneys and stimulate them to activity; also to neutralize the acids in the system so that they no longer irritate, thus often relieving bladder disorders.

Jad Salts can not injure anyone; makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink which millions of men and women take now and then to help keep the kidneys and urinary organs clean, thus often avoiding serious kidney disorders.

—11—

"With every drop of blood in him; with every fiber of his manhood!"

"Where did he first see me?"

"He saw you in London one night, at the Savoy restaurant. The following afternoon you went aboard the same ship."

"I knew it! I knew that I had seen him somewhere. He didn't know who I was?"

"Not at that time."

"Just saw me!"—in wonder.

"Just that. He went to your father the next morning and asked if he might pay court to you. Your father looked upon the affair as a great joke, not being able to gauge sonny. He made a sardonic proposal, and sonny accepted it. He was to come to Bannister and make a name for himself. The newspaper presently became an obligation; and recognizing that, he saw that he must give you up."

"I understand. I searched the crowds for him. I studied every new face I saw, strained my ears for some sign. And even now, but for Nancy, I'd never have known!"

"I tried to make you love me." There was a pause. "The name of Digby Hallowell will mean nothing to you; but your father would recall it. My husband was a thief, Betty, and he died in prison. A thief—the most unforgivable kind."

"And shall my father sit in judgment on sonny's?" asked Betty quietly. "But go on."

"I was born in the South; but at the age of ten I was taken to Europe by an aunt who saw that there was music in me; that I possessed interpretative genius. My parents were dead. I studied in Paris, Berlin, Leipzic, Vienna. All the masters said that I had a brilliant future. When my aunt died, the annuity which supported us ceased automatically, but most of the beautiful things you see in this room fell to me. I had enough for the necessaries of life, and a little amusement besides.

"Somehow I had lost America. I was in the Volksgarten in Vienna one afternoon when a very handsome man in the early thirties sat down in a chair near me. Some children were playing near by. One of them stumbled and fell, and the stranger sprang to its assistance, brushing the bruised knees. 'Poor little codger!' he said in English; and at once I knew that he was an American. I was alone in the world, eighteen, and bubbling with romance. I met him again and again.

"Oh, I loved him. He was charming. He was mad about children; he was genuinely fond of music, painting, books. And his love for me was one great, honest thing in his life. It wouldn't have been so hard otherwise.

"We were married," continued Mrs. Cathewe. "Sonny came. There followed four wonderful summers. Digby would arrive in May and go back in October. The crash came the fourth winter. He was arrested for selling bogus oil and mining stock. He caught pneumonia in prison and died before I could get to him."

Betty reached blindly for the speaker's hand, found it, and presesd it strongly.

"Years passed. When he was twenty I told sonny the story. I told him what his name was, for we were then using the name of Cathewe. I added that if he so willed, he could live all his days in luxury, have all his whims gratified. He replied that he wouldn't use tainted money, and thereupon gave the money to a banker with a plan to disburse it to the poor. Eventually he became a reporter on one of the great newspapers, and discovered that he could write. A month each summer he spent with me; he was at work on his second novel when he saw you."

CHAPTER XI

Understanding.

The telephone buzzed in Cathewe's office.

"Hello!" he called, rather grateful for the diversion.

"This is the city hospital. Mr. Mansfield wants to see you immediately. He instructed me to emphasize the importance of this interview."

"Tell him I shall be up as soon as I can get a taxi around."

At the hospital Mansfield greeted Brandon tersely and grunted an order. "In my coat at the foot of the bed is a long envelope. Open it."

One glance confirmed Cathew's suspicions. The envelope contained the complete history of the trial and conviction of Digby Hallowell.

"Well?" he said calmly.

"Ready to admit that I hold you in the hollow of my hand?"

Cathewe tapped the envelope. "Do you call this fair?"

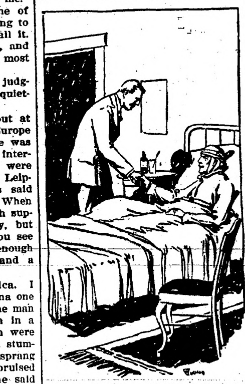
"You're an odd young man! You came here originally because you thought you loved my daughter. What was the main idea, anyhow?"

"You mean, regarding the money my father left? To give it back to the poor. To make the newspaper a bulwark between your kind and mine. To build a great hospital, endowed, to which the poor from the ends of the world might come and find aid without cost. A great free dispensary where the unfortunate woman might also find succor and not be callously sent back to the gutter with her baby. The newspaper to doctor their minds and the hospitals to doctor their bodies. To rebuild their faith in humanity; to make American citizens out of them. Shall I put this envelope back in your coat?"

"No. She sat there in that chair all night, holding my hand. Toward morning she slept. I was in a good deal of pain. It was very still. I fell to thinking. Instead of counting sheep jumping over the fence, I looked myself over, from your point of view, from her point of view, if it should happen she learns the truth. I did not summon you to threaten you. Still, I had to test you. Your chin is still up, and that's the sign I needed. I don't want that envelope. Destroy the stuff. Make Bannister your home; build your free dispensary. What I really wanted was to have you take my hand."

"To shake hands!" cried Cathewe, figuratively swept off his feet.

"Why not? I needed a licking and you were the only man in the world who had the courage to attempt it. I'm no fool. I know men. I want to be the friend of a man who, in these hard, matter-of-fact days, has the courage to walk where angels fear to tread. A smile accompanies that, but it's not visible to you on account of these bandages. A curious idea thrust me into that shack last night. Oh, yes; I saw the poor little tikes, and was glad to save them. But that isn't it. I fought you because I was afraid of you. You were a menacing wedge between me and my daughter. On the day she learned the truth I might lose her. Nothing else matters now but her love. She is extremely imaginative. A deed like last night's would appeal to her. She would always have that moment to throw into the scales. She has opened all the doors of my mind and my heart; I can see and feel. Yesterday I would not have understood you; today I do. There's another secret in that envelope. You overlooked it. You are Cottar, the novelist. But I am offering my hand to the son of Digby Hallowell. Will you take it?"



"To Shake Hands!" Cried Cathewe.

The strength of the hand that closed over his caused a flash of stinging pain. The wince had puckered the burns.

"You understand?"

"Yes. She has made all these things possible."

"That makes our understanding perfect. Her beauty is the least of her. Do you remember you said that? You saw in a glance what it took me three years to find out. You and I are going to make Bannister a perfect city. But I must do my share in my own fashion. I simply can't have her know; at least until I have made substantial progress. You shall have your paper back, of course. I am growing tired. Just a little more. You could have come to me and demanded I fulfill my end of that mad bargain. You were honest, and you declined. Your whimsicality is on the surface; underneath you are unchangeable. So it occurs to me that if you gave up Betty it was not that you had ceased to care. Am I right?"

"Yes."

"As a man cares but once?"

"But once."

"Then—go and find her."

"You mean that?"

"Why not? You are the son of Digby Hallowell, but she is the daughter of Dunleigh Mansfield. Between these two fathers where's the choice? I merely stayed within the law and your father played the game outside. I threw away all the glorious hours that are before you. I sent Betty to France because I didn't care to be bothered with her. Find her, and when you find her tell her I sent you. And then—both of you—come back here!"

Cathewe's taxi went up Polygon hill after the manner of the tank, slowly, ponderously and heartrendingly. Street cars got in the way, other taxis, lumber and coal wagons and pedestrians. Eventually he reached the Mansfield place.

The butler, upon opening the door, eyed him with repellent loyalty.

"Miss Mansfield is not at home, sir"; and suggestively started the door toward the latch.

"Just a moment. I am sent by Mr. Mansfield himself. He wishes me to find his daughter."

"I do not know where she went, sir. It is probable that she is with Miss Maddox."

"May I use the telephone?"

Reluctantly the butler ushered the enemy into the study and indicated the telephone.

The Maddox maid replied to the first call. No; Miss Mansfield had gone across to the Cathewes'. The second call was not answered, though he kept central busy for two or three minutes. Vaguely alarmed, he returned to the taxi. In the end he found himself in his own hallway, breathless with the chase.

Music. She had come to hear his mother play. This accounted for the unanswered telephone call.

CHAPTER XII

Love's Victory.

He opened the door of the living-room and stood on the threshold. Never before had he heard his mother play the "Fourth Ballade" with such fire and passion.

And the girl there, seated on the floor, her exquisite profile, against the dark wine of the rosewood, as beautifully defined as a cameo! Her eyes were closed in dreamy ecstasy.

Here, after what had taken place last night! There could be only one meaning: that she knew everything. Maddox! She had sent for the doctor and in some manner had forced the truth from him. On top of this came the recollection of the cub reporter's confession of having sent Betty a complete series of clippings. She had confronted Maddox with them, and the old fellow had told her the truth. And somehow he must prevail upon her never to let her father know. Here!—because she knew also that he was the author of those letters! Hadn't she come from Nancy's? Out of that abysmal gloom of two hours gone, his miraculous sunshine!

The performer dropped her hands. The piano was still singing as she turned her head.

"Sonny!"

Betty opened her eyes, and slowly rose to her feet, numb with an inexplicable terror, not unlike that which childhood finds in dark rooms. What had happened? This: it was the first time she had ever seen the man who had written those wonderful letters—the exquisite poems to the idyl of this hour. She had come boldly into his house in the pursuit of happiness. She saw now the immodesty of the act. The knowledge sent all the blood into her heart, then flung it into her cheeks—burgundy in an alabaster cup. Always he would think that she had sought him. The shame of it!

She stood with her back to the piano, staring. Tableau. Then she reached backward, toward the bench, toward the arms she wanted, needed. She was afraid. She turned desperately—to find that she had been betrayed. The bench was vacant. Mrs. Cathewe had stolen quietly from the room.

"I— She has gone!" Betty stammered.

He crossed the room quickly, but he did not touch her. "There is no doubt in your mind?"

"Doubt of what?"—beginning to recover her poise.

"Of me? That I love you, that I loved you the first time I saw you?"

"Which of you three is talking?"

"Which of— What do you mean?" bewildered.

"Is it Brandon Cathewe, George Cottar, or Brandon Hallowell?"

"All three of us. We all love you! Can you care, just a little?"

"But you gave me up!"

"Only physically. For weeks I've been torn by wild horses."

"I'm glad of that!"—now sure of herself, of him, of all the world.

"Glad that I was unhappy?"

"Wasn't I unhappy, too? Didn't you jilt me?"

"Do you care?"

"Well—perhaps." A pause. "I'm beginning to wonder if you really wrote those letters."

"Why?"

"Well, the writer of those beautiful love letters wouldn't stand as you do, just asking questions."

"What would he do?" falling into her mood.

"He would sweep me into his arms, kiss me, put me on his horse and ride away—and ask questions—"

"Afterward!"

When she pressed back from him she was breathless. "And now I'm suspicious."

"Suspicious?"

"You did that—overly well!"

"The wonder of you!"

She crept back into his arms, all her mischief gone. "Love me always like that— And don't be afraid of daddy."

"I'm not," he replied. "Your father has made all this possible. He sent me to you."

"He did? I love him! And he shall never know that I know. To want to do fine and noble things because he has learned to love me!" Another pause. "Is there anything now on Jupiter you want?"

There was only one way to answer that.

[THE END.]

Marble is not rigid; a slab under slow heavy pressure will bend like stiff tar or wax.

Woman Tried Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

"A neighbor advised me to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, which she said had helped her so much. So I bought a few bottles and tried it out. It sure helped me wonderfully. I felt much better. My work was no longer a dread to me. If I hear of any one who is troubled the way I was, I will gladly recommend the Vegetable Compound to them and I will answer any letters in regard to the same."—Mrs. Bertha Meachan, 910 Center St., Lansing, Mich.

"I had been sickly ever since I was fifteen years old. After taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound I got so I could do all my housework and I am in good health."—Mrs. Marie K. Williams, Ketchikan, Alaska.

From Michigan to Alaska, from Maine to Oregon and from Connecticut to California letters are continually being written by grateful women recommending Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

The Compound is made from roots and herbs and for more than fifty years has been helping to restore run-down, over-worked women to health.

Are you on the Sunlit Road to Better Health?

Marjorie—"What do you think John said, daddy, when I told him that when we were married I wanted a city residence, a country place, three autos and a lot of servants?"

Marjorie—"He said that if I would sleep more on my right side, I wouldn't have such dreams."

Bad dreams are a good sign of poor digestion; when hard-worked stomach begins to complain, the whole system suffers and we have constipation, dyspepsia, offensive breath and similar disorders.

THROUGH A WOMAN'S EYES

By JEAN NEWTON

Putting Us Right About Marriage

"He has been gone eleven hours—and I am already late."

So wrote the widow of a well-known Frenchman immediately before she committed suicide to join in death the husband with whom she had lived for thirty years.

All during their married life they had remained lovers. Although they both led busy lives, the husband a senator and his wife an artist of repute, each participated fully in the work of the other. When the deputy spoke in the French chamber, his wife was always to be seen sitting in the same seat in the gallery, and everywhere they were together, arm in arm. When he was suddenly taken from her by the only power that could part them, she preferred death to living without him.

This was sad news. But in a world where one hears so much of marital unhappiness it is refreshing to learn of two people who for thirty years remained comrades, lovers, and could not be parted even by death.

On every side we hear of mismating, of infidelity, or sordidness and misery attributed to marriage which makes a travesty of the "ideal state." Indeed so much has matrimony become the subject of caricature that one is not surprised to find a well-known author in her novel putting into the mouth of a child: "Oh, you are married—when are you going to be divorced?"

Sometimes one is impelled to wonder whether there is no longer anything sacred, whether everything is a delusion and a snare. For if marriage which always has and always will be what every woman and every man looks forward to as the fulfillment of existence is a mockery, what is there left?

Yet if an intimate census could be taken of all the married couples in the country, it would show that the failures in matrimony are not nearly so preponderant nor so widespread as it would seem, that this is the impression simply because such people get more publicity while the normal, happy couples who go through life hand in hand, do not get into the newspapers.

Only something sensational or spectacular brings into the limelight the happy couples. And it takes something like this to set us back on solid ground, to give us a realization that love and beauty and comradeship are being widely enjoyed by happily married couples, the cynics and the mud-slingers and the notorious failures notwithstanding.

There Isn't Any Santa Claus

A scientist has announced that he has discovered a method to determine the sex of the unborn child. In other words, if his discovery is put to general use, the nurse will no longer announce to the expectant father pacing up and down outside, "It's a boy," or "It's a girl," she will merely say "He has arrived," or "She has arrived." The point is, do we want the system? It would be interesting to know how our readers feel about it.

Pour moi—as the French say, "as for me"— I think it would be too bad. Science is great, but in its place. And, to my mind, if it is going to take every possibility of surprise out of this life of ours it is going a bit too far.

The only possible benefit that one can see in knowing in advance whether the incomparable is to be a boy or girl is that it would give expectant parents an opportunity to want what they are going to get. It is sometimes embarrassing for a young father who has affirmed and reaffirmed that he wants a boy and therefore it must be a boy to discover, when a daughter is presented to him, that it was a girl he wanted all along. Knowing the fact in advance would help him to know sooner just what he does want.

But what is that in the scales compared to losing forever the kick of the surprise. And that is saying nothing of the fascination of choosing names and not knowing until the great moment which it is to be. Paul or Paulina—Teddy or Theodora—Julia or Jules—Bert or Beatrice—which will it be? Fond grand-dad, after whom the baby is to be named is Phillip; what can we do if it's a girl? Then Phyllis is discovered and all's well. He may turn out a boy, but the fun of hunting for Phyllis is something you wouldn't have missed for the world.

It's like waiting up for Santa Claus. And who wants science to spoil our fun by telling us that there is not any Santa Claus?

First, it leaves the hair soft, silky and easy to manage. (You will appreciate this help if you are accustomed to a soap or a shampoo that makes the hair dry and brittle.) Second, it gently stimulates the scalp, thus promoting a healthy, normal hair growth. More than 2,000,000 women have been won to Marcelle Lemon Shampoo because of these two unique advantages. Resourceful Writer

There was once an artist who was illustrating a novel. "It's a pity it's a love story," he said to the author, "because the only thing I can draw really well is a charging rhinoceros."

"That's easy," replied the author, and turning to the passage where "he quailed before her proud glance," he inserted a few words and handed the manuscript to the artist, who read: "He, who had often faced a charging rhinoceros unmoved, now quailed—"

And so the picture appeared, with the words: "He . . . faced a charging rhinoceros."—Open Road.

Love Called Him to Flora

By R. J. OLIVER

(Copyright.)

Mrs. Malvina Sharples was having a heart-to-heart talk with her daughter Antoinette—otherwise Nettie. "Now you do as I say, and bring that young man to the scratch before he leaves this house tonight. You have had enough beaux, goodness knows! It's time you got a husband. What's going to become of us?"

"Oh do stop, mother," cried Nettie. "I'll get a husband when I get ready—and I guess I'm about ready now. I like Peter Barrows. It is too bad he hasn't more money—and a little more brains. But I have made up my mind to marry him. So don't nag. Has Mr. Bennet been around about the mortgage? The last time he called and you were out he stayed half an hour, talking, and didn't mention money. He said I had beautiful hair," added Nettie with a sigh.

"You don't suppose—!" cried Malvina eagerly.

"Of course not," snapped Nettie. "He is old enough to be my father—and away out of my reach anyway. Don't dream dreams, mother. Jim Bennet would not marry the queen of Sheba." It will be gathered that Nettie and her mother were not exactly sentimentalists. The hard struggle they had had since the death of the husband and father had made these two naturally matter-of-fact women more matter-of-fact still. Nettie was handsome, intelligent, Junoesque. Given a larger field and greater opportunities she might have gone far. As it was she had—after high school—become librarian of the public library in the little town. Efficiency was her middle name.

Peter Barrows had long been one of her admirers. He admired her intellect, her looks, her poise. He had got into the habit of calling upon her at frequent intervals. Still he had never seriously contemplated asking her to be his wife. She was good to look at and a pleasant and intelligent companion—that was all. He was employed by a large firm in the city fifteen miles away. Went in and out every day and lived alone with one old servant in the ancestral mansion he had inherited—about all he had inherited except a good name. He was a good-looking, clean-living young man with a sufficient salary. There was nothing brilliant about him, but he seemed to Malvina Sharples the most available young man for her purposes and she issued orders accordingly.

Peter went away from the Sharples' house that night an engaged man. When he entered that respectable homestead nothing could have been farther from his thoughts than that he would leave it in this condition. He was bewildered, frightened when he got home and thought it over. Well, Peter is not the first young man who has unexpectedly found himself in like case. He knew he ought not to feel as he did and resolved to feel as he ought to feel. Yet it was a decided relief to him when, the next week, his firm sent him away on a business trip.

Something happened. Peter fell in love. She was the daughter of the man he had been sent out to do business with—a pretty little thing with hair verging on red; not highly intellectual; of the clinging sort—a clingstone peach. Her name was Flora Ivins. When Peter diagnosed his case and found out what was the matter with him he was as dazed as he had been when he found himself engaged to Nettie—and a great deal more distressed. Honor bound him to Nettie—love called him to Flora.

By Nettie's request the engagement between her and Peter had been kept secret. But that made no difference, Peter was as fast bound in honor as if their engagement had been announced. Peter and Nettie had promised, when Peter went away, to write to each other every day. But somehow the correspondence had languished. A month went by and Peter's mission was ended. He prepared to turn his face eastward toward Nettie, home and duty. The very morning he was to start he received a letter from Nettie. She wrote that she felt that their engagement had been a mistake: they were not suited for each other. She gave him back his troth. She herself had resolved never to marry but to devote her life to library work. She felt herself better fitted for that than for matrimony.

Peter asked his firm by telegraph for a vacation and got it. He spent it in the Mid-West. When he finally started East he was again an engaged man. This time it was Flora. Arriving at his home town the first man he met as he stepped off the train was Jabez Calender, the town's news budget. "Well, Jabez, what's the news?" asked Peter.

"Oh, not much," replied Jabez, "'ceptin' that Nettie Sharples was married yesterday to old Jim Bennet." Yes, Nettie had married Jim Bennet—and a mighty good wife she made him. Never was a more devoted couple. Malvina was supported in comfort in a separate establishment, complaining bitterly of her daughter's ingratitude.

When Bennet died Nettie grieved deeply, devoted her life to works of charity and never married again. People said that it must have been a love match after all. Who knows? Peter and Flora live in the old Barrows' mansion in easy circumstances—Peter is a member of his firm now—and are on excellent terms with the widow Bennet.

How often do we hear someone say, "John Brown has more luck than I have, that is why he gets along," etc., or "Smith was born under a lucky star, he cannot help but succeed," and similar remarks.

If you will take the trouble to investigate the business methods of these lucky Joneses, and Smiths, you will find that 99 times out of a hundred it is Pluck and not Luck that has made their business a success.

"1776" COMING TO MINNESOTA STATE FAIR

The hundreds of thousands of persons in the Northwest who cannot visit the great Philadelphia Sesquicentennial this year, will have a chance to see one of its greatest entertainment features at the Minnesota State Fair and Northwest Dairy Exposition, September 4 to 11—the mammoth fireworks spectacle, "1776". All of the stirring episodes in the trying struggle for national freedom 150 years ago will be presented, including the signing of the Declaration of Independence, the ride of Paul Revere, the making of the first United States flag by Betsy Ross, the battle of Yorktown, the Boston Tea Party, and a score of other dramatic episodes of the American Revolution.

A great scenic stage, 400 feet long, and fifty feet high, will be used as a background. Tons and tons of fireworks will be blown up sky-high.

This report is somewhat smaller in both number of Lbs. as well No.'s of patrons, which is to be expected at this time of the year. From now on a large number of the patrons having fall cows will be showingup on this report, a time that I am sure is well paid for. Butterfat prices are slowly looming up, however, they are not quite as high as high as they were this time last year. Winter dairying should be encouraged, first because of higher prices, secondly because the average farmer has time to take care of his cows much better. If things are handy, cows are giving milk in proportion to feed they consume, (I mean that the milk they give will leave the farmer a small profit above cost of feed). I do not believe the farmers life is as dark as we some times think and hear it is. If every farmer owned cows that would produce enough milk so the farmer could see his work was being compensated I venture to say they would be much more satisfied. No one can feel good over a days work when he is worse of after he has done a days work then before he commenced his days work. There are cows in the community that help you go in debt without your knowledge, and you continue to feed these same cows when they are actually losing money for you. Most every farmer have a few good cows but as long as he keeps several boarders they will do away with the profit his good cows brings him. Submitted. P. L. Anderson

No Phoning on Sunday

Nova Scotia has resisted the march of modernity to a great extent, says the Providence Journal. The telephone has established itself, but in many towns and hamlets it is not possible to do any telephoning on Sunday. Some slight protest was raised a few years ago in Yarmouth that a telephone call could not be made to a town 30 miles away. But the protest dwindled before such compelling arguments as: "Of course, it may be a trifle inconvenient if there is illness, but that can be overcome in some way, and if we're to start such things, Sunday will be just like any other day."

Keep Fit!

Good Health Requires Good Elimination.

TO be well, you must keep the blood stream free from impurities. If the kidneys lag, allowing body poisons to accumulate, a toxic condition is created. One is apt to feel dull, languid, tired and achy. A nagging backache is sometimes a symptom, with drowsy headaches and dizzy spells. That the kidneys are not functioning properly is often shown by burning or scanty passage of secretions. If you have reason to suspect improper kidney functioning, try Doan's Pills — a tested stimulant diuretic. Users praise them throughout the United States. Ask your neighbor!

OLD SWIMMIN' HOLE VANISHING

Stream Immortalized by Riley Giving Out.

Greenfield, Ind.—The laughter of children at play drowns out "the gurgle of the water 'round the drift just below" the "old swimmin' hole" and few of the surroundings as James Whitcomb Riley knew them during his boyhood days here remain.

A Riley memorial park with a playground borders Brandywine creek at the "old swimmin' hole" which the Hoosier poet immortalized in rhyme.

A railroad bridge, an electric line trestle and the National trail, an important east-and-west motor highway, cross the creek near the "swimmin' hole." The pastoral quietude of the spot, broken only by the hoarse solo of a bullfrog or the plaintive call of a dove, as Riley knew it six decades ago, has been lost in the march of the years. Few of the heavy-foliaged trees that lined the banks

In the long, lazy days
Where the humdrum of school made so many runaways,
How pleasant was the journey down the old dusty lane
Where the tracks of our bare feet was all print so plain remain. The Brandywine itself, once a sizable stream, now is sluggish and shallow and contains scarcely enough water for swimming.

Greenfield basks contentedly in the glory that came to her favorite son. The distinction of having been his birthplace and the center of many of the scenes he sketched in rhyme is one of the city's most stable commercial assets.

The severe two-story frame house on Main street where Riley was born is occupied by his widowed sister-in-law and her sister. For ten cents visitors are permitted to roam the rooms and finger the possessions of Riley which still are retained there.

Before he discovered a bent for verse-making Riley was a sign painter, and several examples of his craftsmanship are preserved here.

Radio Apparatus Value Jumps 215.5 Per Cent

Washington. — The tremendous growth of America's newest industry —radio—was made manifest by statistics published by the Department of Commerce.

In 1925 the value of all radio apparatus manufactured was $170,390,572, an increase of 215.5 per cent over the 1913 production, worth $54,000,470. The number of tube-type receiving sets manufactured increased from 190,374 in 1923 to 2,180,622 last year and the number of radio tubes increased from 4,687,400 to 23,934,658, the rates of increases being 1,045.4 per cent and 410.6 per cent, respectively.

Crystal type sets fell from 223,303, valued at $669,906, in 1923 to 112,656, worth $344,079, in 1925.

English Fight Blindness With Ultra-Violet Rays

London.—Surgeons have succeeded in restoring sight to diseased eyes and by standardizing the method of treatment have opened up the way for a new attack on blindness, said A. J. M. Tarrant, secretary of Moorfields, the biggest eye hospital in the British empire. A year's experiment with a tiny mercury vapor lamp throwing out ultra-violet rays has just been successfully concluded there.

The secretary said the violet-ray treatment had been successfully used in cases of threatened total blindness, the eye trouble in these instances being due to tubercular disease.

Bones Thought Those of People of 4,000 Years Ago

London.—A woman's skull, a thigh bone of a woman about five feet one inch in height and a man's left shin bone, a man's right arm bone found under the bed of the Thames at Sudbury are believed by Sir Arthur Keith, famous anthropologist, to be those of lake dwellers who lived 4,000 years ago.

The shin bone is flattened with the "squatter's foot" showing that the man spent much time in a crouching position. Bones of oxen, horses, pigs and deer also were found. An antler found belonged to an exceptionally large and early species of red deer.

Man Soon to Flutter; Wings for Everybody

Vienna, Austria.—Wings soon will adorn the least angelic of men, says M. Lutsch, an Austrian inventor. He is credited with building an apparatus to be worn by the individual, which will enable everyone to do a certain amount of flying in comfort and safety.

The machine consists of a pair of wings, moved by a motor which, although extremely light in weight, furnishes a surprising amount of power. The first model weighed 80 pounds and lifted the inventor several yards from the ground and enabled him to move swiftly in any direction at will.

M. Lutsch declares that his invention when perfected can be turned out at low cost—something in the neighborhood of $200.

YANGTZE IS LIFE ARTERY OF CHINA

Only River Outside America Guarded by U. S.

Washington.—The only river outside American territory on which United States gunboats are constantly on guard; the busiest river waterway in the world; and the stream whose basin holds a greater population than any other.

Such, according to a bulletin from the Washington (D. C.) headquarters of the National Geographic society, is the Yangtze river of China, where, because of looting expeditions by Chinese factional troops, the United States naval authorities have warned American ships to curtail sailings on part of the stream.

"The Yangtze Kiang cannot quite claim to be either the greatest or the longest river in the world," says the bulletin. "Its length is about 3,000 miles and it is therefore exceeded by the Mississippi-Missouri, the Amazon, the Nile and one or two others. In volume it probably ranks third: after the Amazon and the Congo. But the Yangtze can lay claim to a much more important factor than mere bigness or length. With its tributary rivers, lakes and canals, it constitutes the inland water system most used by man as a carrier of his commerce.

"The Yangtze rises in central Tibet at an altitude of 15,000 feet or more among the tangled mass of mountains and plateaus that also give birth to three other huge Asiatic streams: the Yellow, the Mekong and the Salween. In its journey to the sea it cuts through several distinct mountain ranges, forming some of the deepest river gorges in the world. At one point in Yunnan, the gorge of the river is 13,000 feet deep. In 1923 and 1924 these far western gorges of the Yangtze were explored and for the first time photographed by an expedition of the National Geographic society, headed by Joseph F. Rock.

Not Yangtze to Chinese.

"As a whole, the river is known as the Yangtze only to the western world. It has perhaps a dozen names to the Chinese at different points along its course. Only the two or three hundred miles nearest the ocean go by the name 'Yangtze Kiang' to the natives. The most popular names farther up are the Chinese equivalents of 'The Long River' and 'The Great River.'

"The Yangtze is a west-east river flowing in the lower temperate zone. Placed in the same latitude in America, the stream would rise in southwestern Arizona not far north of Yuma. It would cross into Texas just east of El Paso and zigzag southeastward to Monterey, Mexico, its southernmost point. Turning northeastward it would then parallel the Gulf coast a few miles inland, passing near Houston, New Orleans, and Pensacola, to flow into the ocean at Savannah. To duplicate actual conditions this imaginary American Yangtze should, of course, have a solid block of rich territory to the south where the Gulf of Mexico lies.

"On this relocated river, ocean-going ships would sail 640 miles to New Orleans, the relative position of Hankow, China's greatest distributing center. Smaller river steamers would ascend more than 300 miles farther to Houston, the relative position of Chungking, head of steam navigation, passing en route through the famous mid-Yangtze gorges. Junks would ascend as far as the Texas-Mexican border and beyond.

"The Yangtze is the life artery of China. It drains an area of 770,000 square miles, equal to one-quarter the total area of the United States; and in this basin live approximately 175,000,000 people—once and a half the population of our 48 states.

Natural Commercial Advantages.

"At no other place in the world are three all-important economic factors making for trade so happily associated: a broad, deep-natural waterway for ships and a teeming, civilized population living on fertile, cultivated soil. The Yangtze, from 30 to 40 miles wide at its mouth, is a broad open door to the sea inviting the ships of the world to enter. And enter they do. Trans-shipping is unnecessary for 640 miles, ocean-going steamers ascending easily that distance to Hankow. But broad as the Yangtze is, it is crowded with traffic. The traveler finds no break in the unending stream of steamers, barges, junks and sampans. And frequently he encounters one of the huge rafts of logs on each of which the crew and their families have built a little village. On these floating islands, pigs and chickens wander about, children play, and women hang out their wash and carry on other domestic duties exactly as in some little Chinese hamlet on dry ground.

"When China was forced after the middle of the past century to open up interior ports to the commerce of the West, the ships of the United States, Great Britain, France, and other powers entered the Yangtze. This shipping was often in danger because of uprisings and looted towns. The powers, including the United States, therefore stationed gunboats on the Yangtze to protect their interests. This is the only place in the world where the United States navy maintains such a force on a foreign river. Since the World war this flotilla, now consisting of seven boats, has been known officially as the American 'Yangtze patrol.' Their cruising itinerary takes them far up the Yangtze river.

OLD KAISERHOF IS DOOMED TO GO

Famous Hostelry to Become Office Building.

Berlin.—The German government has decided to purchase the historic Kaiserhof hotel on Wilhelmstrasse and to convert it into an office building.

Berlin society thereby is greatly disturbed, and from every quarter protests are descending upon the ministry of finance. Parliament is being bombarded with pleas to veto the arrangement. Many Berliners feel that one of the chief connecting links between the old and the new Germany would thus be destroyed.

The Kaiserhof during the fifty years of its existence has been the scene of some of the most brilliant functions under the imperial regime. Here the weddings of the smart set were held. Whenever a large festival took place at court, to which potentates came from foreign countries, some of the guests were lodged in the Kaiserhof, as the acommodations at the royal palaces were limited. For many years Prince von Bulow, former chancellor, was its star guest.

The emperor's brother, Prince Henry, the grand duke of Hesse and many other royal personages lived at the Kaiserhof, and among those who paid them formal visits were Czar Nicholas of Russia and King George and Queen Mary of England.

Among historic occasions were the arrival of the Boer generals, De Wet, Botha and Delare, after the defeat of the Boer armies in South Africa in 1901; the dinner arranged in honor of Count Waldersee and the other officers who served against the Boxers in China, in 1900, and the benefit bazaar held under the protectorate of Empress Auguste Victoria in 1900.

The Kaiserhof, the first really modern and luxurious hotel to be erected in Berlin, so impressed the aged first German emperor, William I, that he remarked to his brother, Prince Karl, "That's better than anything we can afford."

Texas Banker Plans Gulf Bird Paradise

Corpus Christi, Texas.—St. Joseph's island, in the bay off Corpus Christi, is to become the home of one of the greatest private bird preserves in the country.

Thousands of the winged creatures are to be nested on the island under a plan promulgated by T. O. Frost, San Antonio banker and sportsman.

Frost and associates have purchased the island outright. A large number of quail already have been stocked on the preserve, and other members of the game winged family are to be placed thereon for conservation purposes.

Under the Frost plan, St. Joseph's island will outrival in bird tenantry the qualities of Bird island, about which much has been written. No expense is to be spared in making the preserve complete for the future care of the feathered guests. The island will be a mecca for students of bird lore.

"Plug in" Telephone Flirts on Police Board

Boston.—Many of the telephone calls answered by the Fields Corner station of the Boston police department recently have been inquiries for "Gladys," or "Ida" or "Helen."

For a long time Officer Williamson, who handles the outside calls in addition to his duties at the police box tape, was nonplussed by the frequent queries for the girls and called in vain on his thirty-odd years of sleuthing to solve the mystery.

Then one of the Dorchester telephone operators volunteered an answer. To rid themselves of persistent flirts, who insist on securing their home telephone number, the flappers, Gladys, or Ida or Helen and others give the inquisitive Johnny the police station number and have the last laugh.

Fate Opens a Letter and Uncovers Slaying

Susquehanna, Pa.—A letter opened by mistake has led to the discovery of an alleged murder and the arrest of Ernest Plew, a farm hand.

Glenn S. Hinkley opened the letter addressed to his father, George W. Hinkley, a well-to-do farmer of Gibson, Pa. It was an inquiry from a bank as to whether the elder Hinkley had given Plew authority to draw money on Hinkley's name.

An investigation resulted in the arrest of Plew when he came into town wearing Hinkley's clothes and carrying his check book. He confessed to the police he had put poison in Hinkley's tea recently after he learned that he had considerable money. The two men lived alone.

Plew led the officers to a spot in the woods where he had dragged the body of Hinkley.

IN TWO WRECKS, STILL LOVES SEA

Wife of Naval Officer Always Happy on Water.

Boston.—Although she was aboard the Titanic when it crashed into a north Atlantic iceberg the night of April 14, 1912, and the disaster cost 1,517 lives, Mrs. Rose Ellen Murray of this city loves the sea.

And her love for the sea must indeed be deep and lasting, for she also was aboard the Lusitania when it was riven by a German torpedo off the coast of Ireland, May 7, 1915.

With the Lusitania 1,198 persons went down. Mrs. Murray was saved only after clinging almost unclothed to wreckage and an overturned lifeboat from early afternoon until past midnight.

And yet Mrs. Murray continues to travel the sea. Black memories visualize its menace, but—

"I love it," she says, smilingly.

She has crossed the Atlantic 34 times. The Lusitania trip was her seventeenth.

"It's strange," she says, "When I'm on land I'm all nerves. Often I can't sleep. Time after time I live through it all again. But when I'm at sea I forget it all."

Mrs. Murray and her naval officer mate were married 16 years ago. In a year more Murray will be eligible for retirement. And then his wife wants to sail around the world.

Wife and Fish Gone, Man Lets Train Kill Him

Somerville, N. J.—Disheartened because his wife had left him and one of two friends with whom he had been fishing in the Raritan river had disappeared with their unusually large catch, Stanley Sabotka, thirty-two years old, of South Somerville, sat on a rail of the Felmington branch of the New Jersey Central railroad near here, and was struck by the locomotive of a passenger train and killed.

Sabotka and Stanley Gersarsek and Paul Prevosnee of Somerville had spent the afternoon fishing on a bridge which crosses the Raritan near the estate of the late James B. Duke, about half a mile from this place. Gersarsek, the police said, admitted that they had imbibed liberally of liquor and said that Sabotka frequently had referred to the disappearance of his wife three days ago.

As they were preparing to start for their homes Prevosnee gathered the fish in a bag, and, in the darkness, disappeared. Gersarsek said that he took this as a joke, but that Sabotka was in no mood for jokes of the kind and remarked, "It's tough enough to lose your wife, but when your friend runs away with the fish you've caught, that's the limit."

They were near the end of the bridge when the rumbling of the train was heard by the pair. Gesarsek said that Sabotka ignored his warning, and continued to walk toward the rails.

"Don't walk over there," Gersarsek said he shouted to Sabotka as he ran up to grab him by the arm and pull him back. "The train is coming, and you'll be killed."

"I don't give a d—n if it does come," Gersarsek quoted Sabotka as replying. "My wife has left me, and now Prevosnee has run off with the fish."

Gersarsek added that Sabotka sat on a rail as he said this. He said he tried to pull his companion out of danger but had to leap to one side to save his own life. The next instant the locomotive struck Sabotka.

Branding of Jilts Taboo by Corean Court Decree

Tokyo.—The quaint Corean custom of carving a design on the neck of a girl who has jilted her sweetheart was frowned upon by the Tokyo Appeal court when it sentenced Lyu Tetsufuku to 18 months' imprisonment for murderous assault on a girl in Moji, Corea.

Lyu's defense was that he had been engaged to the girl, but that she had found a handsomer man and had left him. He produced witnesses to prove that ancient Corean customs permitted him, under the circumstances, to shave off her eyebrows or to cut a slice of skin from her neck.

The court ruled, however, that the carving custom had no standing in law and Lyu was committed to prison.

CENSUS REVEALS ASTONISHING FACT

8,549,511 Working Women in United States

Many Say Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Helps Keep Them Fit to Work

8,549,511 women would be a vast army. According to the 1920 Census of Manufactures, that is the number of women and girls employed in all trades in the United States.

Napoleon said, "An army travels on its stomach." This army of women travels on its general health. Every working girl knows that time lost through illness seldom is paid for and seldom can be made up. Employers demand regularity. If she wants to keep her job or hopes for a better one, she must guard her health.

Atlanta, Ga.—"My system was weak and run-down, and I was tired. I was this way for five years or more. I read your advertisement in the papers and I decided to try your medicine, the Vegetable Compound, but I did not begin to take it regularly until after I was married. I got so much good from it that I feel fine and have gained in weight. I work in a broom shop, but my work is not so hard on me now, and I keep my own house, and work my garden, too. I am telling all my friends of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and how it has helped me."—MRS. W. M. BAILEY, R. F. D. No. 5, Box 27, Atlanta, Georgia.

Missouri Woman Helped

Parkville, Mo.—"I am proud to recommend Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I was so ill that I could not lie down at night. Then I got my husband to go to the store and buy me a bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and I was up and around before the first bottle was gone, although I only weighed about ninety pounds. I took six or eight bottles and was able to do all my housework, washing and ironing, take care of my five boys, and tend to my chickens and garden, where before I had to hire my washing and part of my housework."—MRS. ANNA COLE, R. R. 2, Parkville, Missouri.

Is It Eczema ?

Roscoe, S. Dak.—"I was advised to use Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery for relief of eczema. I took the advice and ordered one bottle. That semed to help me somewhat, and I was encouraged to get another. I had used only two bottles when I found this trouble was completely overcome. I had taken treatment from doctors, but nothing had helped me until I used this wonderful 'Discovery.' I never realized what it was to have smooth and healed hands. CHAPTER I

—1—

The secretary of state of the signory of Florence urged his mule across the bridge that spans the Misa, and drawing rein upon the threshold of the town of Sinigaglia, stood there at gaze. On his right to westward the sun was sinking to the distant hazy line of the Apennines, casting across the heaven an incendiary glow to blend with that of the flames that rose above the city.

The secretary hesitated. Scanning the scene before him with the wide-set, observant eyes that moved so deliberately in his astute, olive-tinted face, he wondered uneasily how things might have fared with Cesare Borgia. The uneasy guards at the gate who, had watched him closely, mistrusting his hesitation, hailed him at last, demanding to know his business. He disclosed himself, whereupon they respectfully bade him to pass on and enjoy an ambassador's immunity.

Thus bidden, he conquered his hesitation, touched his mule with the spur and pushed on through the slush and snow toward the palace.

The clamor, he observed, came all from the eastern quarter of the town, which he knew—for he was a surprisingly well-informed gentleman, this Florentine—to be inhabited by the Venetian traders and the prosperous Jews. Hence he argued logically—for he was ever logical—that the main issue was decided and that the uproar was that of looting soldiery; and knowing as he did the rigor with which looting was forbidden to the followers of the duke of Valentinois, the only sane conclusion seemed to him to be that, notwithstanding all the guile and craft at his command, the duke had been worsted in the encounter with his mutinous condottieri. And yet in his wisdom and in his knowledge of men Messer Macchiavelli hesitated to accept such a conclusion, however much the facts might seem to thrust it upon him. He guessed something of Cesare Borgia's design in coming to Sinigaglia to make peace with the rebels and settle terms for the future. He knew that the duke had been prepared for treachery—that he had done no more than pretend to walk into a trap, having taken care first to make himself master of its springs.

Messer Macchiavelli leaned from the saddle to question a rustic on the outskirts of the mob.

"What is happening?" quoth he.

"The devil knows," answered the man addressed. "His potency the duke with Messer Vitellozzo and some others went into the palace two hours since. Then comes one of his captains—they say it was Messer da Corella—with soldiery, and they went down into the borgo, where they say they have fallen upon the troops of the lord of Fermo, and the lord of Fermo is in the palace, too, and it is New Year's day tomorrow. By the Madonna, an ugly beginning to the new year this, whatever may be happening! These be dread times, sir. They do say—"

Abruptly he checked his loquaciousness under the discomposingly fixed gaze of those somber, observant eyes, and bethought him that he were perhaps wiser not to make himself further the mouthpiece of popular rumor.

"But then," he ended abruptly, therefore, "they say so much that I know not what they say."

A sudden surge of the crowd drove the Florentine orator and the rustic apart. A roar arose from the throat of the multitude.

"Duca! Duca!"

Standing in his stirrups, Macchiavelli beheld in the distance before the palace a glitter of arms and the fluttering of bannerols bearing the full device of the House of Borgia.

On came the glittering riders, jingling and clanking, and at their head on a powerful black charger rode a splendid figure, all steel from head to foot. His vizor was open, and the pale young face within was set and stern. The beautiful hazel eyes looked neither to right nor left, taking no heed of the acclamations thundering all about him. Yet those eyes saw everything whilst seeming to see nothing. They saw the Florentine orator, and seeing him, they kindled suddenly.

Macchiavelli swept off his bonnet, and bowed to the very withers of his mule to salute the conqueror. The pale young face smiled almost with a certain conscious pride, for the duke was well pleased to have, as it were, the very eyes of Florence upon him in such a moment. He drew rein on a level with the envoy.

"Ola, Ser Niccolo!" he called.

The lances cleared a path speedily, flinging the crowd still farther back, and Messer Macchiavelli walked his mule forward in answer to that summons.

"It is done," the duke announced. "I have fulfilled no less than I promised. What it was I promised you will now understand. I made my opportunity, and having made it employed it so well that I hold them fast, Vitelli, Oliverotto, Gravina and Giangiordano's bastard. The other Orsini, Gianpaolo Baglioni and Petrucci, will follow. My net is wide-flung, and to the last man they shall pay the price of treachery."

He paused, waiting for words that should tell him not what opinion might be Messer Macchiavelli's own, but what reception such news was likely to receive in Florence. The secretary, however, had all the caution of the astute. His face remained inscrutable. He bowed in silence, as one who accepts a statement without consciousness of the right to comment.

A frown flicked between the splendid eyes that were considering him.

"Much has been done," the duke resumed. "But much is yet to do, and who shall tell me what?" He looked at Macchiavelli, and his eyes invited counsel.

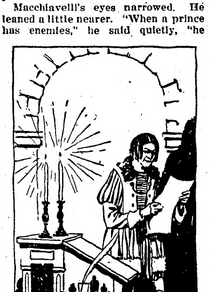
"Does your potency ask me?"

"Indeed," said the duke.

"For theory?"

"The duke stared; then laughed. "For theory," he said. "The practice you can leave to me."

Macchiavelli's eyes narrowed. He leaned a little nearer. "When a prince has enemies," he said quietly, "he must deal with them in one of two ways: he must either convert them into friends or put it beyond their power to continue his enemies."



He Indited His Famous Letter to the Signory of Florence.

The duke smiled slowly. "Where learnt you that?" he asked.

"I have watched with admiration your potency's rise to greatness," said the Florentine.

"And you have melted down my actions into maxims to govern my future?"

"More, magnificent, to govern all future princes."

The duke looked squarely into that sallow, astute face with its somber eyes and prominent cheekbones.

"I sometimes wonder which you are—courtier or philosopher," he said. "But your advice is timely—either make them my friends or put it beyond their power to continue my enemies. I could not again trust them as my friends. You will see that. Therefore . . ." He broke off. "But we will talk of this again, when I return. You will find entertainment in the palace. Await me there."

He made a sign to his lances, wheeled, and rode on briskly, while Macchiavelli made his way to the palace as he had been bidden, and thence he indited his famous letter to the signory of Florence, in which he announced these happenings to his masters. He informed them of the manner adopted by Cesare Borgia to turn the tables upon those who had not kept faith with him, he told them how his master-stroke had resulted in the seizure of the three Orsini, of Vitellozzo Vitelli, and Oliverotto, lord of Fermo, and he concluded with the opinion: "I greatly doubt if any of them will be alive by morning."

Justice under Cesare Borgia was a farcical procedure. He had ideas of his own, as you will soon learn.

French Financial Law

An apprenticeship tax was provided for in the French financial law passed July 13, 1925. By the terms of the law a so-called "apprenticeship tax" is imposed on every person or organization engaged in industrial, commercial or mining enterprises, with certain exceptions, whose annual pay roll amounts to more than 10,000 francs. The tax is used to extend the work of trade, commercial and industrial schools, of the national vocational schools, and of occupational or other courses which have for their object the restoration of apprenticeship training or the preparation of young people for a commercial or industrial occupation, and also to extend the development of scientific laboratories.

If Kidneys Act Bad Take Salts

Says Backache Often Means You Have Not Been Drinking Enough Water

When you wake up with backache and dull misery in the kidney region it may mean that you have been eating foods which create acids, says a well-known authority. An excess of such acids overworks the kidneys in their effort to filter it from the blood and they become sort of paralyzed and loggy. When your kidneys get sluggish and clog you must relieve them, like you relieve your bowels, removing all the body's urinous waste, else you have backache, sick headache, dizzy spells; your stomach sours, tongue is coated and when the weather is bad you have rheumatic twinges. The urine is cloudy, full of sediment, channels often get sore, water scalds and you are obliged to seek relief two or three times during the night.

Either consult a good, reliable physician at once or get from your pharmacist about four ounces of Jad Salts; take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help clean and stimulate sluggish kidneys, also to neutralize acids in the system, so they no longer irritate, thus often relieving bladder weakness.

Jad Salts is inexpensive, cannot injure and makes a delightful, effervescent lithia-water drink. Drink lots of soft water.

Retired Nebraska Farmer Wins 20-Year Fight

Victim of Chronic Ill Health Conquers His Ailments. Now Eats Foods Long Denied Him. Praises Tanlac

J. C. Eley, 3418 R St., Lincoln, Nebr., a retired farmer, says:

"Seven years ago I had almost given up hope of ever getting well. For 20 years I had suffered torture. My strength had gone; in fact, I was a wreck. My arms and legs were almost useless. I couldn't eat without bloating and suffering all the torments of indigestion.

"I was about ready to give up when a friend suggested Tanlac.

"This tonic worked wonders with me. My old strength quickly returned. I recovered my appetite and ate everything. Tanlac certainly put me on my feet. I am now 70; Tanlac made me stronger and gave me better health than I have had in years. I have recommended Tanlac to hundreds of people since and it backs up all the praise I give it."

Tanlac usually conquers ailments and builds up strength in weakened bodies. It frees the system of poison caused by constipation and sluggish liver. It is nature's own remedy made from roots, barks and herbs according to the famous Tanlac formula.

Banish sickness from your life! Take Tanlac. The first bottle will surprise you. Ask your druggist for Tanlac—today!

WILL "SHOW OFF" WEST TO THE EAST

Railway Opens Exposition Building in Gotham Featuring Northwest's Advantages.

St. Paul, Minn.—Agricultural products, industrial resources and summer resorts of the Northwestern states from the Mississippi river basin to the Pacific Coast are to be exploited on a large scale by unique exhibits to be installed on Fifth Avenue, New York City, as the result of elaborate arrangements made by the Great Northern Railway, according to announcement made by president Ralph Budd of the Hill line. This is the first time that a western railway ever opened an exposition building of its own in the nation's metropolis and the experiment is being watched with interest by the other big roads of the country.

The Great Northern has leased a five-story building fronting on Fifth Avenue and Forty-eighth Street, and will open a new passenger ticket office and Northwest travel bureau on the ground floor of the building June 1. This office will be the most modern and attractive ticket office in New York, it is said.

A plan has been made to permit the various states and communities served by the Great Northern road to make suitable display exhibits in the Fifth avenue windows of the office, and a schedule is being worked out to provide for special window displays featuring Glacier National Park, the Ten Thousand Lakes of Minnesota, the lumbering industry of the Pacific Northwest, the dairy industry of Minnesota, diversified farming in North Dakota, sugar beet industry, hydro-electric power, apples of the Wenatchee valley and Spokane and scenic attractions of the Pacific Northwest, including Lake Chelan, Mount Rainier National park, Mount Baker natural forests and the Columbia river highway.

LETTER OF APPRECIATION.

To My Friends and Supporters In Marshall County:

I hereby take the opportunity to extend to you all my heartfelt thanks for the splendid support and large number of votes you favored me with at the General Election this Fall. Although I did not reach the Goal, it certainly is gratifying to see the confidence you have in me. Again thanking you, I remain,

Yours very truly,
Peter E. Kvikstad,
Argyle, Minn.

AN APPRECIATION

Altho not elected, I am not discouraged, but feel gratified to know that over two thousand voters registered their wish to entrust to me one the most important positions in the County of Marshall. I wish to extend my appreciation to all my friends and supporters, and especially to the people of Holt and surrounding precincts who all gave me comfortable majorities.

Sincerely,
Levi G. Johnson.

CARD OF THANKS.

To the Voters of Marshall Co.:

As the Thanksgiving Days are here and, having good friends far and near, I wish to extend my thanks sincere to Marshall County voters, especially to my old friends who have always stood by me whether I have won or lost; also all my new friends, for the loyal support and votes at the last election.

If I had been elected your representative I would have done my best to represent the taxpayers and people of this County and State. I would have opposed All the crooked schemes that always come up in the Legislature, to bleed the farmer and the taxpayers, to the best of my ability.

Respectfully yours,
P. B. Malberg,
Steiner, Minnesota.

WHY GOVERNMENT PRICE FIXING WON'T WORK

One of the most persistent fallacies is government price-fixing on competitive commodities. There is already government price-fixing in commodities and services where competition plays no part in price determination. These are railway transportation, electricity, gas, telephone and telegraph, and so on. Here government price-fixing is solely to protect the consumer. There are two fatal objections to government price-fixing for agricultural products, which represent the most competitive business in the world. These are, first, that it will not work; second, that it is always done for the consumer as against the producer.

Government price-fixing for agricultural products would work if at the same time the government regulated wages, profits, middlemen's margins, the production of all commodities and the rationing of all consumers. In short, if the population were enlisted in one vast army, directed and rationed, price-fixing would work, but otherwise not. If the price is fixed on the wheat the farmer sells, then he cannot keep on producing wheat if wages or the cost of harvesting machinery rise, or if the cost of other material he buys rises. So the next step would be the fixation of other prices, and yet other prices.

The United States government fixed the price of wheat but once in our history, and then it was to benefit consumers, not producers. The government might, in an emergency, fix some agricultural prices for the purpose of elevating such prices. Such action would inevitably and speedily lead to outcry from city consumers and a consequent reversal of policy. Indeed, the consumers, not the producers, are most likely to demand and secure food price regulation by government authorities. The farmer, therefore, who favors any form of governmental price-fixing is working against his own interests. He is putting his head into a noose.—James E. Boyle, Professor of Rural Economics, Cornell University, in the Banker-Farmer.

STRAIGHT TALKS WITH AUNT EMMY

ON HOW TO LEAVE AN ESTATE

"Do you know, Aunty," said Helen, as she accepted a cup of tea from Aunt Emmy, "I feel terribly sorry for Mrs. Strong."

"Yes," agreed Aunt Emmy, "it will be hard for her. She is such a dependent, helpless, little thing."

"Oh, I don't mean that," interrupted Helen. "Her feelings are so hurt because, as she says, her husband publicly insulted her by not making her executrix and trustee of his estate."

"Good gracious, child, did she say that!" exclaimed Aunt Emmy, setting her cup down with a bang.

"Yes, she did, Aunty," said Helen, enjoying the sensation she had made and determined to make the most of it, "and I'm sure I agree with her. The idea of that old man appointing a trust company to look after Mrs. Strong's money. It isn't as though there wasn't plenty of it. The Strongs are the richest people in town, I guess."

"Well, for mercy's sakes!" cried Aunt Emmy, disgust in every syllable, "if it don't beat all! You are as big a fool as she is then!"

"What do you mean, Aunt Emmy?" asked Helen with dignity. "I think it nothing short of disgraceful for a man to show that he has no confidence in his wife by putting his money in strangers' hands to be doled out to her as they see fit."

"You never thought that up, Helen," said Aunt Emmy, "that's Mrs. Strong. She always talks as though she was living in a story book, poor, silly, little thing."

Helen blushed and Aunt Emmy went on—"Do you know what it means to administer an estate, especially a big one like Mr. Strong's?"

"Why, no," stammered Helen, "but it must be simple."

Aunt Emmy sniffed. "Simple! Let me tell you a little about it. When a man dies the things he owns cease for a time to be anybody's property and become his estate. The property passes from his control on his death naturally, and as his estate it is controlled and supervised by the Court which will be in charge of the estate for many months probably. First this Court finds out whether or not there is a will and if the will is valid. Then it must find out about the executor. If the will is properly drawn and valid, it will be 'admitted to probate.' The persons who witnessed it must be found and examined.

"The executor must satisfy the Court as to fitness and willingness to perform the many arduous duties involved. Perhaps he will have to furnish a bond, to assure the Court of his financial responsibility. He must assemble all the so-called assets, have them valued and file an inventory and appraisal of them with the Court. All the debts against the estate must be collected. The settlement of all claims against persons and corporations is a job no one without a thorough knowledge of business can undertake.

"In an estate like Mr. Strong's there is sure to be a certain amount of financial negotiation that demands banking knowledge. Then the executor must pay claims against the estate in the order of precedence laid down by law. Also you know state inheritance and federal estate taxes must be met promptly. Finally, after the estate is settled as to claims it has and claims against it, the executor must see that the various bequests are made."

"Oh, Aunty, don't tell me any more. I never thought that there were so many complicated things to be done. Poor Mrs. Strong never knew a thing about business."

"Mr. Strong knew that," remarked Aunt Emmy dryly, "and don't you suppose he had his children in mind, too? He wanted his estate handled so that the children and Mrs. Strong would be protected and assured of a good, comfortable living all their lives, with something to go on to the grandchildren. Even if Mrs. Strong were a business woman, no one could tell how long she would live to administer the estate. He knew that the trust company would not die, nor lose its faculties, nor be influenced by personal feeling so that it might be unjust to some one, and that it represents some of the best business and banking judgment in town."

"Well, I guess old man Strong knew what he was doing!" said Helen.—Anne B. Aymes.

Minnesota Has Largest Tow-Mill in the World

What is said to be the largest tow mill in the world is now in successful operation at Red Lake Falls, and is paying out to farmers of that section about $50.000 per annum for a by-product that was heretofore a complete waste.

Tow is the fibre of flax straw from which all the "shive" or chaff has been removed. The product is used instead of horsehair for stuffing upholstered furniture, and the vogue for this type of furniture has created a ready market for all the tow available.

The Red Lake Fall mill handles from 6,000 to 8,000 tons of flax straw during the season. Much of this is hauled in by the farmers in that vicinity and some is shipped in from other parts of northern Minnesota and North Dakota. For No. 1 straw, baled, the mill pays $8.00 per ton, delivered at the mill, while for the second grade, $7.00 per ton is paid.

Hair Getting Thin?

Maybe You Don't Shampoo It Right

If your hair is falling out and getting thin in spots it's time to give a little thought to the way you shampoo. Many men make the mistake of using ordinary soap for shampooing. This is wrong, because the free alkali in ordinary soap makes the hair dry and brittle and absorbs the natural oil from the scalp. Thousands of men attribute their thick, strong hair to the regular use of Marcelle Lemon Shampoo. This amazing preparation cleans the hair perfectly without making the hair dry and brittle. Also it acts as a gentle stimulant to the scalp, thus promoting a healthy, natural hair growth. Use Marcelle Lemon Shampoo for a month and note the marked improvement in the appearance of your hair.

Thanksgiving Day in New England

In Colonial times it was a day of homecoming, giving thanks, turkey and pumpkin pie—It was the Puritan Christmas, the one day of merry-making and cheer.

Grandmother had no farther to go than the cellar or the turkey pen to obtain the material for her Thanksgiving spread.

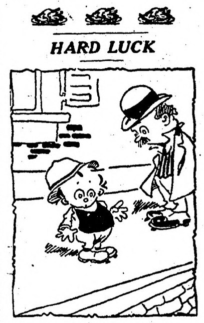
But what about these luckless wights who had no ancestral farmhouse to which they might repair on Thanksgiving day? Were they left desolate? Not at all. The innkeeper to the rescue. It seems that the old inns along the rock-bound coasts fairly rivaled the homesteads in making merry on Thanksgiving. Hezekiah Butterworth gives us a picture of that hospitable ordinary, the Inn of the Good Woman, that stood in the east end of Boston in the early part of the Eighteenth century.

The sign of the inn was a picture of a woman without a head, the suggestion being that the head is a dispensable part of a truly good woman, and that silence and service became the landlady. It is said that the device set many a woman's tongue to wagging, that the sign became the topic during the dinner hour, and that it is probable the discussions led to the first woman's rights opinions formed in old Boston town. In describing the life at the Inn of the Good Woman, the author doubtless shows what was being enacted in many another old inn on Thanksgiving day. He says:

"The Inn of the Good Woman was famous for its humor and lively tales, and after-dinner stories on Thanksgiving days were a feature of the period of political expectancy. Thanksgiving was the Puritan Christmas, in Colonial times, the one day of merry-making and good cheer." After the morning sermon and the noon feast Thanksgiving afternoon and evening were seasons of social enjoyment, given over to musician, riddler and story-teller. The wayfarer, the bachelor, the traveler, the immigrant, all who were without an established home, found happiness in front of the great fires of the inn and tasted the joys of "the jug, the beef, the turkey, the brown bread, the succotash, the pumpkin cake, the apple dumplings." The Inn of the Good Woman had an especially American cuisine on Thanksgiving, says the author. "There the peppery sausages were browned for all in the morning; the apple dumplings with potato crusts and pandowdy were served as a dessert at noon, and the hot gingerbread with like liberality at the evening meal. There the best, the cleverest, the most thrilling of all the marvelous stories were told."

If one were a wayfarer, a bachelor, a traveler or an immigrant, and were permitted to take the trail of the yesterdays, would not one seek to join the company at the Inn of the Good Woman this Thanksgiving day? Would one not feast upon the food of reason and the flow of soul, and in so doing is there one who would refuse a second helping of that pumpkin "cake" or pumpkin pie which the hostess offered? No; more likely one would, as one crunched the brown crusts and yellow meat, echo in silence the children's "Hurrah for the pumpkin pie!"—Kansas City Times.

HARD LUCK



"You seem worried, my boy."

"I am, mister; you see I've been to three newsboys' dinners an' I'm 'fraid I can't git to the two others."

Early Proclamations

History records that in 1763 Halifax proclaimed a day of Thanksgiving to mark the peace that made Canada a British possession. Thirty-two years later, in 1795, Washington, first President of the United States, issued the first national Thanksgiving proclamation of that country. The day was more or less generally observed by a number of the States in succeeding years, and since President Lincoln's call for its observation in 1864, has grown in significance, and has attained standing as a national holiday in the Republic.

BRINGING HOME THE TURKEY

When father brought the turkey home—
You must remember that?
The thrills—the wild excitement, too—
From mother down to cat!
No circus day in all Youth's years,
No toy in Santa's pack,
Outrivaled Dad when he came home—
A gobbler on his back!

When father brought the turkey home—
I see him smiling now,
Though neighbors, knowing our estate,
Looked on and wondered how.
We children did not understand,
But, since, I've heard Dad say;
"Your mother joyed in sacrifice
To make Thanksgiving day!"

When father brought the turkey home—
Perplexities arose;
Where would we keep it? Mother said:
"The cellar, I suppose."
We made a prisoner of our prey,

Put stones against the door,
Then spent a sleepless night in fear
We'd see him nevermore!

When father brought the turkey home—
Dear mother used to say:
"I need the wings to dust the hearth
And brush the crumbs away."
All other feathers would be ours,
For Indians abhor
To go unfeathered down the trail
When counciling for war!
—William Herschell, in the Indianapolis News.

Not Easy to Trace Ancestry of Turkey

There are some who claim that the turkey which gets such a prominent place at Thanksgiving time, came from Mexico. Both the Mexican wild bird and our barnyard turkey have a creamy white on the tips of the tail feathers and on the feathers overlying the base of the tail. The wild turkey of the East is a decided chestnut brown. Very often a domesticated bird will appear very like its Mexican granddad, several times removed, except for a greater development of the fatty lobes of head and neck.

There are others who tell us that when the Spaniards made their conquest of Mexico they found at Montezuma a fine zoological garden. In it were nearly all the native birds and animals, with many gathered from afar. Strutting about were the ancestors of our domestic turkey. The zoo birds were domesticated. In the outlying country there were many wild brothers and sisters of these birds. Before the first quarter of a century was over some of the domestic birds had been transplanted to the West Indies and the Spanish main, where they were kept by colonists. By 1540 the turkey had made its way to England, and 30 years later was in high favor as the Christmas dish of the English farmer.

Harvest Home Feasts Old English Custom

The following lines were often sung in rural England at the celebration of Harvest Home:

Harvest-home, harvest-home,
We have ploughed, we have sowed,
We have reaped, we have mowed,
We have brought home every load,
Hip, hip, hip, harvest-home!

Nowadays the last day of "carrying the corn" is not marked by such hearty rejoicing and feasting as formerly. Most of the old harvest customs have been allowed to drop. In many parts of England, Harvest Home was the name given to the festival celebrated in honor of the corn-gathering. In Scotland the term was Kirn. Kirn-supper was the name given to the meal, which was the principal item in the rejoicings. The word probably comes from "churn," as a churn of cream was often part of the material entertainment. In the north of England the feast was called the Mall supper. Probably this term comes from the French melee (a scramble, mixture, or mingling).

NIGHT AND THE DAWNING

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman.)

"I DON'T know what to do with myself evenings," sighed Ronald Cray, leaning out of the back window of his bachelor apartment and surveying the gloomy flats around him.

Two months before he had been summoned home from New Mexico, where his power dam had made him famous, to take charge of the engineering department of his company at headquarters. His salary was ample, he had wealth, he was only twenty-five; yet he had managed to make no acquaintances in the big city.

A free life in the West had made him different from the average city-bred young man; he thought the metropolis stiff and its people devoid of interest.

Suddenly, as he leaned out, surveying the huge buildings and speculating how many thousand lives ran on in them, a light sprang into being in the building opposite, on the fifth floor, on a level with his. Behind a drawn shade he saw the silhouette of a man.

He was stooping over a table and, as Cray watched, he saw the shadow of a woman behind him. Suddenly her hand plunged downward. The elongated object in it looked like a poniard. It struck the man in the side of the neck and he rolled over.

The woman stood looking at him for a moment; then, with a gesture of triumph, she flung the poniard out of the window, raising the shade a little. Cray heard a metallic tinkle in the court below. Then followed darkness.

He leaned out, astounded at what he had seen and hardly believing it real. How long he waited he did not know. Suddenly his bell rang.

He went out into the passage and saw, standing outside the door, one of the most beautiful women whom he had ever met. She was twenty-three or four. Her eyes gleamed with feverish intensity, her hair was disheveled and her hands were red.

"Save me! Hide me! Help me!" she pleaded.

Cray did not hesitate an instant. He pulled her through the doorway and led her to the bathroom. He filled the basin and washed her hands, drying them on a towel afterward. Then he took her into his spare room.

"You're quite safe here," he said in a low voice. "Nobody saw you come in. You can stay as long as you want to."

She crouched in a corner, glaring at him like a hunted beast. He hesitated, then he closed and bolted the window and withdrew, leaving the door open.

For half an hour he waited, fearing that he would hear the bolt snap, that she would try to plunge down into the court below. But hardly a sound came from the room. When at last he returned she was lying on the floor asleep.

He placed her on the couch and she did not awaken. Her sleep was of profound exhaustion. All night Cray sat up, waiting. Sometimes he stole in to look at her, but she never stirred. It was not till the sun was well up that he heard her moving.

She came forward unsteadily and looked in at him as he sat by the window.

"Where am I?" she cried. "Who are you?"

Cray rose and took her by the hands. "I am a friend," he answered. "You are safe here—safe to come or to go."

She burst into hysterical sobbing. When at last he had quieted her the girl told Cray her story.

She had met a man in her home in Virginia, three months before. He had asked her to be his wife. Her parents mistrusted him; she followed him stealthily, to learn too late that all that had been said about him was true. He was a gambler, a swindler. She remembered those three months with loathing. Her horror of him had grown. He had deceived her with a mock ceremony, lied to her—at last she had learned that he had a wife already.

She had written home, but her letters were returned unanswered. She had nowhere to turn, she was ignorant of any trade, and the man held her by his lying promises. He had almost got his divorce, he said; he loved her; for her sake he would reform, if only she would trust him.

She had waited for him the evening before; then there was a dreadful blank in her mind, and she had recovered to find herself standing over the body. And she had fled wildly for shelter.

Cray patted her hands. "You stay with me until the trouble blows over," he said. "I want a housekeeper. You will be quite safe here. I shall let it be known that you answered an advertisement. When all is ready I will help you to a new life. You trust me?"

She looked at him helplessly. "I am so ignorant," she wept. "I must trust you. I have nobody else."

"You will not regret it," said Cray. And he knew the girl was safe there. Nobody came to call at his little apartment.

The murder occupied two columns of his morning paper, but the only clew was that afforded by a negro janitor, who had seen a woman ascending the steps a few minutes before the tragedy. And he stated that her hair was fair. The unknown woman's was ebony dark. Cray felt safe.

The poniard was found, but gave no clew. And gradually the interest waned. Nobody knew the murdered man, who had very good reasons for disguising his identity.

As the days passed Helen Ware came to trust Cray absolutely. She cooked for him, mended his clothes, resolutely refused to take the money that he pressed upon her. "I can never forget what I owe you," she would say. But sometimes there would be spells of weeping. "I did not mean to kill him," the girl would moan. "I do not remember anything, except sitting at home waiting for him with bitterness of heart; then I heard him come in and went to him—and I was standing over him with the dagger in my hands."

"You don't recall the dagger?"

"Yes. It was a curio of his; some friend from a savage country had given it to him. I must have snatched it from the wall and stabbed him."

As the weeks turned into months, Cray found himself torn between two impulses. He wanted to let the girl go to some scene where she would be able to take up her life anew. And yet—he knew that he loved her. Her helplessness, her charm, the bond between them had created an intimacy that was infinitely sweet. He had been offered a new position in the West. One night he took his courage in his hands and asked her to be his wife and go with him where all memory of the past could be forgotten.

He knew by her looks that she loved him. But she would not.

"It is your pity for me, Ronald, not love," she said, sighing. "I love you, but I can never be your wife so long as this curse of blood lies on me."

"You acted rightly," he cried hotly. "No jury would have convicted you. Helen, dearest, forget it and come with me."

"I cannot," she answered sadly. "I must leave you, and you must forget."

But on the next day something happened which drove all thoughts of parting from their heads. The wife of the murdered man was arrested charged with the crime.

It was known that she had been in the city that day. She had threatened him; the negro janitor identified her as the woman he had seen near the apartment house. And Ronald and Helen watched the unfolding of the grim trial with dismay.

On the evening before the last day Helen spoke to Ronald about what lay uppermost in her mind.

"I cannot let that woman be convicted," she said. "I must go down to the court and offer my confession."

Ronald could not dissuade her. He knew that it was the only possible thing.

And all day they sat in the dreary courtroom listening to the intolerably long summing up. The jury had at last retired. Ronald had persuaded Helen not to speak unless the verdict was "guilty."

It was hours before the jury returned. A murmur spread through the courtroom. The face of the foreman was deadly white. He trembled and looked away from the prisoner's straining eyes. There could be no doubt what the verdict was.

Suddenly Helen sprang to her feet. Ronald rose and kept his arm about her. She faced the prisoner and stretched out her hand.

But before a word could leave her lips the woman in the dock uttered a shriek and recoiled, clutching at the air.

"Yes, I am guilty," she cried. "He lied to me, deceived me. I learned that he was supporting another woman, who was passing as his wife. I dogged him to his home. I entered after him. I saw him in the hallway, and over his head a dagger hung. It seemed placed there for me. I struck him—and then the other woman came out—and she stands there!"

And she collapsed unconscious upon the floor.

Helen fell into Ronald's arms.

"It is true! It is true!" she cried. "I remember everything!"

The verdict of "manslaughter" was further eased by a mercifully light sentence, and, with the obstacle to their marriage removed, Ronald and Helen went West, where they started upon their new life together.

Cases of Friendship Between Sexes Rare

Platonic friendships between women and men are rare and short-lived, says Thyra Samter Winslow in an article in Liberty. "Biologically, I think we will all agree that a fifty-fifty deal between the sexes is impossible," she writes. "Platonic friendship is a beautiful thing, but I have seen few cases of it in real life. Either it ripens into something deeper—and far more interesting, as a usual thing—or it drifts into an acquaintanceship that becomes pretty much of a bore. Real friendship without thought of warmer affection is rare.

"Friendships between men and women," the writer continues, "are among the most beautiful of human relations, but in nearly all the cases that have come under my observation it has been the man who has been the cause of ending them. Either he insisted on trying to turn friendship into a more amorous relationship, or his love affair—or affairs—with some other women made him neglect his friendships almost entirely.

"As long as biology exists in its present state—and there is no reason to suppose it will change—life will be more or less of a game and the war of the sexes will exist in various forms."

IN DAYS OF OUR FOREFATHERS

Women Prepared Their Own Medicines

The wise pioneer women learned to gather, in woods and fields, the remedies the Indians used. From the rafters of colonial houses, hung great bunches of dried roots and herbs. From these, in times of sickness, the busy mother brewed simple and powerful remedies.

From roots and herbs, Lydia E. Pinkham, a descendant of these sturdy pioneers, made her Vegetable Compound. The beneficial effects of this dependable medicine are vouched for by hundreds of women.

Mrs. Wm. Kraft of 2838 Vinewood Ave., Detroit, Mich., saw a Pinkham advertisement in the "News" one day and made up her mind that she would give the Compound a trial. At that time she was very weak. "After the first bottle," she writes, "I began to feel better and like a new woman after taking six bottles. I recommend it to others and always keep a bottle in the house."

Mrs. Gust Green of 401 Lincoln Park Boulevard, Rockford, Illinois, found herself in a condition similar to that of Mrs. Kraft. "I was weak and rundown," she writes, "but the Vegetable Compound has helped me and I feel better now. I recommend it to all women who need more strength."

The Way of a Maid with a Man

by Rafael Sabatini

W.N.U. SERVICE COPYRIGHT

STORY FROM THE START

Cesare Borgia, duke of Valentinois, Italy, is having difficulties with his mercenaries. He has just finished crushing several of his powerful rivals, the job having been completed with the ruthlessness which only he knew how to employ.

Anon he was to realize that for all his penetration he had failed to plumb to its full depth the craft and guile of Cesare Borgia. So astute an observer should have perceived that to have wrung the necks of the Orsini out of hand would have been to spread consternation and alarm in the lair of the bear in Rome, and that, being alarmed, the powerful Cardinal Orsini, his brother Giulio and his nephew Matteo (with whom we are more particularly concerned) might seek safety in flight, and in that safety concert reprisals.

The lords of Fermo and Castello were dealt with as Macchiavelli expected. They were formally judged, found guilty of treason against their overlord, and strangled that same night—back to back, with the same rope, it is said—in the palace of the prefecture of Sinigaglia, whereafter their bodies were ceremoniously borne to the Misericordia hospital. But the Orsini did not share just yet the fate of their fellow traitors. They were accorded another ten days of life, until, that is, Cesare had received advices from Rome that the Cardinal Orsini and the rest of the Orsini brood were safely captured. Thereupon at Assisi—whither the duke had removed himself by then—Gravina and Paolo Orsini were delivered over to the strangler.

The duke's net had been wide-flung, as he told Macchiavelli on that evening in Sinigaglia. Yet four there were who had escaped its meshes: Gianpaolo Baglioni, prevented from waiting upon the duke in Sinigaglia by an illness which had proved less fatal to him than had their health to his associates; Pandolfo Petrucci, tyrant of Siena—the only one of them all who seems to have had the wit to mistrust the duke's intentions—who, armed at all points, had taken refuge behind the ramparts of his city, there to wait upon events; Fabio Orsini, who had gone after Petrucci; and Matteo Orsini, the latter's cousin and the cardinal's nephew, who had vanished no man knew whither.

"But I swear to God," Cesare informed Fra Serafino, the minorite friar who discharged the functions of secretary in the absence of the moon-faced Agabito—"I swear to God that there is no hole in Italy into which I shall not pursue him."

This was at Assisi on the very day that he ordered the strangling of Gravina and Giangiordano's bastard. On that same evening came one of his spies with information that Matteo Orsini was in hiding at Pievano, the castle of his distant kinsman Almerico—an Orsini this last, too aged and too inactive to be worthy the duke's attention, a studious man, living almost in seclusion with his books and his daughter, untouched by ambition, asking but to be left in peace, undisturbed by all the strife and bloodshed that were afflicting Italy.

The duke received the messenger in a vast stone-flagged chamber that was very bare and chill. A great fire roared in the cavernous fireplace, shedding an orange glow upon the empty spaces and driving the shadows before it to seek refuge in the groins of the ceiling overhead. Fra Serafino occupied an oaken writing-pulpit near one of the windows, and sat cutting a quill, apparently lost in his task, yet missing no word of what was being said.

The messenger was intelligent, and he had been diligent. Not content with learning that Matteo Orsini was believed to be at Pievano, he had scoured the borgo for scraps of gossip, anticipating out of his own knowledge the very question which the duke now asked him—though not directly—and seeing to it that he came equipped with a ready answer.

"This, then, is mere gossip," Cesare sneered. "'It is said' that Matteo Orsini is at Pievano. I am sick to death of 'It is said,' and all his family. I have known him long, and never found him other than a liar."

"But the tale, may it please your potency, has its probabilities," said the messenger.

The duke halted in his pacing. "Probabilities?" said he. "Discover them."

The messenger was prepared to do so."

"The Count Almerico has a daughter," he said promptly. "It is the common talk of Pievano that this lady—Madonna Fulvia she is called—and Ser Matteo are to be married. The kinship between them is none so close as to forbid it. The old count approves, loving Ser Matteo as a son. And so, where else in Italy should Ser Matteo be safer than with those who love him?"

The duke considered the fellow in silence for a moment, weighing what he said.

"You reason well," he admitted at length, and the messenger bowed himself double, overwhelmed by so much commendation. "You have leave to go. Bid them tell Messer da Corella to attend me."

The man bowed again, stepped softly to the door and vanished. As the heavy curtain quivered to rest Cesare abruptly turned to Fra Serafino, who was now testing the quill he had cut.

"What is to be done to take this fellow?" he asked.

It was his way to seek advice of all men, yet never following any but such as jumped with his own wishes. And where no man's advice consorted with his own notions, he acted upon his own notions none the less.

The gaunt-faced monk looked up, almost startled by the suddenness of the question. Knowing the duke's way, and knowing that Corella had been sent for, Fra Serafino put two and two together, and presented the duke with what he conceived to be the total sum.

Send ten lances to fetch him from Pievano," he replied.

The duke considered him, smiling faintly.

"You prove to me that you know nothing of Pievano, and still less of men, Fra Serafino. I wonder do you know anything of women?"

"God forbid!" ejaculated the monk, utterly scandalized.

"Then you are worthless as a counselor in this," was the duke's conclusion. "I had hoped you could have imagined yourself a woman for a moment."

"Imagine myself a woman?" quoth Fra Serafino, his deep-set eyes staring.

"That you might tell me what manner of man would be likeliest to delude you. You see, Pievano is a rabbit warren. You might conceal an army there—how much more easily a single man! And I do not intend to alarm the Count Almerico into sending to earth a guest whom we are not absolutely sure that he is harboring. You see the difficulty, I trust? To resolve it I shall need a man of little heart and less conscience; a scoundrel who is swayed by nothing but his own ambition, who cares for nothing but his own advancement; and it is an inevitable condition that he should be of an exterior that is pleasing to a woman and likely to command her confidence. Now where shall I find me such a paragon?"

But Fra Serafino had no answer. He was lost in an amazed consideration of the crooked underground ways by which Cesare burrowed to his ends. And then Corella clanked in, booted, bearded, stalwart and stiff, the very type of the condottiero.

The duke turned, and considered him in silence at long length. In the end he shook his head.

"No," he said, "you are not the man. You are too much the soldier, too little the courtier, too much the swordsman, too little the lute-player, and I think that you are almost ugly. If you were a woman, Fra Serafino, should you not consider him an ugly fellow?"

Cesare Borgia makes a wager—a thousand ducats to a horseshoe. And somebody stands in a good way of losing his head!

Roads Laid Out by Animals

There is an idea become current of late that none but a man of science, bred in a school, can lay off a road. This is a mistake. There is a class of topographical engineers older than the schools and more unerring than the mathematics. They are the wild animals. They travel thousands of miles, have their annual migrations backward and forward, and never miss the best and shortest route. These are the first engineers to lay out a road in a new country; the Indians follow them, and hence a buffalo road becomes a warpath. The first white hunters follow the same trails in pursuing their game, and after that the buffalo road becomes the wagon road of the white man, and finally the railroad of the scientific man."—Senator Benton of Missouri.

Accuses Jeweler's Girl of Conspiring for Ring

New York.—Irving Fleischhacker brought suit in the Supreme court, Brooklyn, against his former fiancee, Miss Ruth Finkelstein, to recover $12,000, which includes a claim for $10,000 for her alleged breach of promise to marry him, $1,400 alleged to have been paid her father, Robert Finkelstein, for their engagement ring, and $1,000 for entertainment and presents he says he gave the girl.

Fleischhacker is a salesman. He said he became engaged to her after she had professed great love for him. He said he found out later she had never intended to marry him, and that she and her father had conspired to make him buy the ring from the girl's father, and spend the money on her.

This done, Fleischhacker said, the girl's ardor toward him cooled, and she refused to marry him. Miss Finkelstein denied the charges and said it was Fleischhacker who broke the engagement after he found out she was not to have a big dowry, on which he had set his hopes.

YEAR IN PRISON BREAKS HIS WILL

Man Who Sassed Judge Now Willing to Be Good.

Kansas City, Kans.—After thinking it over for one long monotonous year in a jail cell, Jimmy Algernon Hall, forty-two years old, of this city, has decided that a life term in prison is too long merely for telling a judge to go chase himself.

Besides, Jimmy already has established what probably is the world long-distance record for being in contempt of court. Now he has become a little weary of jail life and wants to get out.

He wants to get out so badly that he is willing to surrender his nine-year-old daughter, Grace Angela, to her mother.

Accordingly there is to be a reunion between Grace Angela and her mother in the same courtroom where Jimmy, ordered a year ago to reveal the whereabouts of his daughter, replied rather churlishly:

"You and her (meaning Mrs. Hall) can go chase yourselves. I'll rot in jail first."

His honor, the district judge, swallowed, adjusted his glasses, and retorted:

"Very well, we'll let you rot."

Jimmy has "rotted" a year now and has sent word to the judge he is ready to give in.

Notorious Hen Thief Again in Prison Cell

Phoenixville, Pa.—Abe Buzzard, notorious mountain chicken thief, is again behind prison bars.

His life has comprised 31 years of freedom, much of which was spent in chicken and other petty thievery, and 43 years spent in jail in repentance, study and evangelism.

With two companions, he was arrested in the hills of North Coventry township with a wagonload of chickens, automobile tires and other articles alleged to have been gathered during a night's raid on neighboring farms.

His arrest brought to an end one of the longest stretches of freedom Abe has enjoyed since he was a strip of a boy. Each term in a cell has found him more determined than ever to reform and to go out into the world as an evangelist to atone. His determination usually vanished quickly.

In his youth he was the leader of a band of highwaymen that for years terrorized the Welsh mountain country near Reading.

He spent much of his time in prison in study. The Bible was one of his favorite books. After his release in 1901, after having served seven years, he toured the state, lecturing on "Ruin and Reformation." Two years later he was again in prison for stealing chickens—this time for ten years. Three other periods of repentance were followed by various terms behind the bars.

Finds Drowned Body by Setting Bread Afloat

New London, Conn.—Sergt. W. E. Busby of the state police, remembered a custom of his childhood when he was asked to search the waters of Lake Zoar for the body of Mrs. George Lewis of Bridgeport, so he set five loaves of bread adrift and one of them, after floating about a few minutes, came to a stop, while the others went on. Assistants grappled where the loaf of bread stopped and found the body.

Mark Twain had Tom Sawyer hunt a body in a similar way, although Tom put quicksilver in his bread. Sergeant Busby used only bread.

Mrs. Lewis, who was the wife of the chief inspector for the United States Aluminum company at Fairfield, went fishing alone on Saturday. Sunday morning the boat was found floating half full of water.

Drugs Excite the Kidneys, Drink Water

Take Salts at First Sign of Bladder Irritation or Backache

The American men and women must guard constantly against kidney trouble because we often eat too much rich food. Our blood is filled with acids which the kidneys strive to filter out; they weaken from overwork, become sluggish, the eliminative tissues clog and the result is kidney trouble, bladder weakness and a general decline in health.

When your kidneys feel like lumps of lead; your back hurts or the urine is cloudy, full of sediment, or you are obliged to seek relief two or three times during the night; if you suffer with sick headache, or dizzy, nervous spells, acid stomach, or if you have rheumatism when the weather is bad, begin drinking lots of good soft water and get from your pharmacist about four ounces of Jad Salts. Take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine.

This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help flush and stimulate clogged kidneys, to neutralize the acids in the system so they no longer are a source of irritation, thus often relieving bladder disorders.

Jad Salts is inexpensive, cannot injure, makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink and belongs in every home, because nobody can make a mistake by having a good kidney flushing any time.

SCHOOL NOTES

A christmas program is being planned. Almost all the pupils in the school will take part in it. There are now about three weeks remaining before it will be given and with the work that will be put on it we expect to make the annual event, the best that has ever been presented.

—Buy Christmas Seals—

The seventh grade Geography class has finished the regional study of South America. This is a new method of teaching geography. Instead of studying a continent by countries, the regions or groups of countries which have the same products are studied at once, thus eliminating unnecessary repetitions.

—Buy Christmas Seals—

The eighth grade history class has been studying the Industrial Revolution. The class was interested in comparing new methods of industries with those of our forefathers.

—Buy Christmas Seals—

The seventh grade language class has started dictionary work. Pupils are encouraged to figure out the pronunciation and meaning of the words by themselves; then they are allowed to compare their words with those in the dictionary. More interest is taken when this drill is made to resemble a game. Never let a word get the best of you.

A few of the high school girls were out joy-riding with a team of oxen on Monday.

Supplementary reading constitutes the work of spare moments for the second grades. During the first three months Gordon Ellestad has read eight books outside of class periods.

The second grade has been working very diligently to reduce the length of time to give the answers to the first thirty-four additional combinations and their universe. Gertrude Nohre has completed them in fifty seconds.

The primary grades have organized into a club. They have voted upon "Busy Bee" as their name. Clayton Gunheim has been elected president.

"The World Book," an encyclopedia in ten volumes, has just been placed in the high school room. This is the 1927 edition, and contains all up-to-date information.

The editors of "School Notes" have been Gertrude Reierson and Anne Evenson. This editorship will change hands with the next issue. The new writers will be Hildred Ordahl and William Davis. This work is done by members of the English I class.

Our school recently received the Christmas Seals. The sale started by the school on Wednesdry. We also received information and statistics concerning the value of this work in our county. Last year Christmas Seal Sales amounted to $13.70, in Holt. Christmas Seal your mail this year.

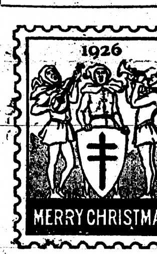
DOCTOR MAYO BUYS FIRST SEAL

"Of course I want some Christmas Seals," said Dr. C. H. Mayo when John Allen Furlow, five-year-old son of Congressman and Mrs. Allen J. Furlow, made his appeal "Help fight tub-a-closis, Doctor 'Charlie?'" Doctor Mayo is shown in the picture above officially opening the 1926 sale in Rochester by purchasing the first seals.

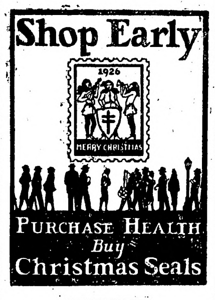
CHRISTMAS SEALS REAL LIFE SAVERS



Christmas carolers, long associated with the true Yuletide spirit, are this year adding new laurels to their fame. They have enlisted in the fight against tuberculosis and we find them on the 1926 Christmas Seal, making a plea for a place on every letter, card, and package mailed during December.

"Peace on earth—Good Health to men" is the song these Christmas Seal carolers sing. Their names are Health, holding the double-barred cross, under whose emblem tuberculosis deaths have been cut in half; Hope, who looks forward to the day when the White Plague will be no more; and Happiness, who represents the joy brought to the world by the penny Christmas Seal.

"Buy Us—and Use Us," is their plea. "We'll make your mail more attractive, bring good health wishes to your friends, and most important of all, provide money to drive tuberculosis from the nation."



United Central America

In 1823 the five Central American states were united into a national federation, which subsequently adopted a constitution modeled after that of the United States. The federation was partially ended by 1838, practically dissolved in 1839, and completely dissolved in 1847.

Wefald To Contest Selvig's Election

According to a news item from St. Paul Congressman Knud Wefald has started to contest the election of C. G. Selvig, notice to that effect having been filed with the secretary of state by James Witherow of Moorhead. The grounds for contest is alleged to be violation of the state corrupt practices law by circulation commenting on Wefald's action on the national immigration act. Mr. Selvig's majority in the election was 962, according to official figures.

Children's Hair
Needs Special Care
Try This New Way

It isn't fair to your child to wash her hair with harsh soaps or ordinary shampoos. Harsh soaps and shampoos leave the hair dry and brittle and often work an actual injury to the scalp. The safest way is to wash the hair regularly with Marcelle Lemon Shampoo. This mild cleanser leaves the hair soft, silky and easy to manage. Also it acts as a mild stimulant to the scalp, thus promoting a healthy, normal hair growth. Many women attribute their children's luxurious hair to regular Marcelle Lemon shampoos. In fairness to your child, start using this amazing preparation now.

>
> Cesare Borgia, duke of Valentinois, Italy, is having difficulties with his mercenaries. He has just finished crushing several of his powerful rivals, the job having been completed with the ruthlessness which only he knew how to employ. One of his enemies, however, seems to have escaped, and Cesare is uneasy. This is Matteo Orsini. It is believed that he is in hiding with his recluse kinsman, Almerico, at Pievano. Cesare seeks the right man to find Matteo.

—3—

"I am not a woman, magnificent—"

"That is all too evident," the duke deplored.

"And I do not know what I should think if I were a woman. Probably I should not think at all, for I do not believe that women think."

"Misogynist," said the duke.

"God be thanked," said Fra Serafino devoutly.

The duke returned to the consideration of his captain.

"No," he said again. "The essence of success is to choose the right tools for the work in hand; and you are not the tool for this, Michele. I want a handsome, greedy, unscrupulous scoundrel, who can both ply a sword and lisp a sonnet. Where shall I find one answering that description?"

"What is the task, magnificent?" ventured Corella.

"I'll tell that to the man I send to do it, when I have found him. Is Ramirez here?" he asked suddenly.

"He is at Urbino, my lord," Corella answered. "But there is Pantaleone degli Uberti, who seems in some way such a man as you describe."

The duke considered. "Send him hither," he said shortly, and Corella bowed stiffly, and departed on that errand.

Cesare paced slowly back to the fire, and stood warming himself until Pantaleone came—a tall, handsome fellow this, with sleek black hair and bold black eyes, martial at once in bearing and in apparel, yet with a certain foppishness not unbecoming to his youth.

The interview was short. "From information that I have received," said Cesare, "I will wager a thousand ducats to a horseshoe that Matteo Orsini is with his uncle at Pievano. I offer that thousand ducats for his head. Go and earn it."

Pantaleone was taken aback. He blinked his bold black eyes.

"What men shall I take?" he stammered.

"What men you please. But understand the thing is not to be done by force. At the first show of it, Matteo, if he is there, will go to earth like a mole, and not all your questing shall discover him. This is an affair for wits, not lances. There is a woman at Pievano who loves Matteo, or whom Matteo loves. . . . But you will see for yourself what opportunities there are, and you will use them. Corella thinks you have the wit to accomplish such a task. Afford me proof of it, and I will make your fortune." He waved his hand in dismissal, and Pantaleone stifled a hundred questions that were bubbling in his mind, and departed.

Fra Serafino stroked his lean nose thoughtfully with his quill.

"I would not trust that fellow with a woman, nor a woman with that fellow," he delivered himself. "He is too full in the lips."

"That," said Cesare, "is why I chose him."

"In a woman's hands he will be so much wax," the monk continued.

"I am stiffening him with a thousand ducats," said the duke.

But the friar's pessimism was nothing lessened. "A woman's arts can melt gold until it runs," said he.

The duke looked at him a moment. "You know too much about women, Fra Serafino," he said, and under that rebuke the monkish secretary shuddered and fell silent.

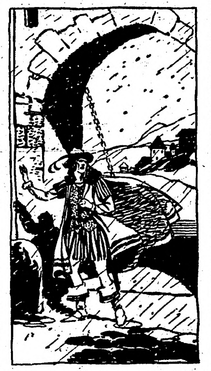
CHAPTER II

Pantaleone degli Uberti arrived at Pievano on the wings of a snowstorm that swept across the Perugian foothills, and he arrived alone. Within a couple of leagues of the little town he had parted company with ten knaves he had brought with him from Assisi. He gave them orders to break up into groups of twos and threes and thus follow him to Pievano, each group seeking different quarters and pretending no acquaintance with the others. He concerted signals by which at need he could rally them to himself, and arranged that of the group of three who were to take up their quarters at the Osteria del Toro, one at least should remain constantly at the inn where at any moment Pantaleone could find him.

He bade them, further, dissemble their true estate, and, himself adopting this course which he imposed upon his followers, he staggered some hours later over the drawbridge into the courtyard of the citadel on foot, a bedraggled, footsore man who seemed to be upon the point of utter exhaustion. Admitted by a groom, he reeled into the presence of the Lord Almerico Orsini and gasped out as if with his last breath an urgent prayer for sanctuary.

"I am a hunted man, my lord," he lied. "That bloody despot Valentinois clamors for this poor life of mine to swell his hecatomb."

The old lord of Pievano's white hands clawed the carved ebony arms of his great chair. From under shaggy brows his piercing dark eyes were bent upon this visitor. He knew well what was the hecatomb to which Messer Pantaleone referred; no need for him to ask; absorbed though he might be in his studies and removed in mind, as in body, from all worldly turbulence, yet, being an Orsini, it was not in human nature that he should remain ignorant of and indifferent to the shedding of Orsini blood. And since here was a man who, as it seemed, was come straight from the scene of strife, he was to be welcomed as one bringing news on matters closely touching the lord of Pievano.



He Staggered Some Hours Later Over the Drawbridge.

Yet it was as characteristic of old Almerico Orsini as it was anomalous in his day—when life was cheap and the misfortunes of others troubled men but little—that his first thought should be for this stranger's condition. Seeing him so piteously bedraggled, so white and haggard, swaying like a drunkard where he stood and breathing with obvious difficulty—in short, a man who had reached the uttermost limits of endurance—the Lord Almerico made a swift sign to the groom who had admitted him. The lackey thrust forward a rush-seated chair, and into this Messer Pantaleone sank limply yet gratefully.

He looked at the Lord Almerico with a faint smile that seemed to express his thanks, and then his bold eyes, seeming very weary now under their heavy drooping lids, passed on to the lady who stood beside her father's chair. She was a girl, no more, of a willowy, virginal slenderness, very simply clad in a wine-colored gown cut square across her white young breast, and caught about her slender waist by a silver girdle with a beryl clasp. Her blue-black hair was held in a clump behind by a net of golden cord; her eyes, of a blue so deep that they seemed almost black, considered him piteously from out of her pale face.

> Cesare believes he has sent the right man for the job. But before long events will show whether his judgment was correct.

Sound Common Sense

Between the value of a man's work and the money a buyer will pay for a finished article, the capitalist has his indispensable function. He must supply what people will find they want. But that will not in itself make them want good things. Sir Ernest Beven advises them to save rather than to spend, but only taste and morals can teach them spending. And when they have done both, they will need to adjust the social organism by some giving, which means as much from mind as from pockets. If the dues for that are left to the state, hundreds of millions will be thrown away.—Robert Lencourt in the Atlantic Monthly.

Advised by the Principal

By JANE OSBORN

(Copyright.)

MARY DAWSON went timidly into the principal's room to sign the time chart that first day of her career as teacher in Public School No. 78. As she approached the table a young man drew back to let her precede him.

"Thank you," said Mary, and as she looked at him all she noticed was that he had red hair.

"I didn't know there were any men teachers here," she observed at recess to one of the younger teachers whom she met in the playground. "I saw one when I was signing in this morning—young—with red hair—what grade does he teach?"

"That's Dick Mendham — teaches eighth-grade boys. There are three of 'em—if you call 'em men—never seen like real men to me. But they have to have 'em to teach the big boys."

Later Mary Dawson realized that this young woman's attitude toward the men teachers at No. 78 was characteristic of the attitude of the other women teachers there.

After Mary had been teaching for a month or more Miss Graham, the principal, asked her to stop in her office after school to see about report cards. It was a small matter soon arranged and then Miss Graham asked Mary to sit down and have a little chat. Miss Graham asked Mary how she liked her work. Mary said she liked to teach, though she was doing it to make a living."

"I'll give you a piece of advice," said Miss Graham, who was fifty. "Snap out of it as soon as you can. Once the system gets you it will be hard to get out. You'll put off the idea of marriage because every year you'll look forward to a little more money the next. Then you'll begin to count the years to your retirement with a nice annuity the rest of your life. Now my advice to you is to marry your best young man soon—before you get obsessed with this idea of yearly increase and eventually retirement."

"But suppose I haven't a young man," said Mary smiling.

"Marry the first man that asks you—providing he's decent. Don't wait for a man who can guarantee a yearly increase and an annuity in your old age."

"I'll remember what you have said," said Mary with a little blush, and would have said more but Miss Graham interrupted.

"Don't go away," the principal was calling good naturedly—then in an aside to Mary. "There's poor Mr. Mendham—scared off because you're here. Somehow men teachers never seem like real men." Then, raising her voice: "Come right in, Mr. Mendham, I want to show you the new report cards."

Mary hurried out of the principal's room, tingling with a sort of deep resentment. It wasn't because of what Miss Graham had said about marriage. Undoubtedly she had given good advice. It was because of what she had said about Mr. Mendham. Mary herself liked Mr. Mendham and respected him.

After that Mary took pains to speak cordially to Mr. Mendham when she passed him in the corridors. It was absurd to snub him. If he wanted to teach in a public school that was his own affair.

One day she was leaving the school at the same time that Mr. Mendham passed out the teacher's entrance, and because Miss Graham was standing by, Mary waited for him and asked him if he would walk with her—since they both went in the same direction. A few days later when he had walked home with her she asked him to come into tea at her boarding house. It was four o'clock and her boarding-house keeper, who was an English woman, always had tea in the little parlor.

A month later Mary found herself one evening after dinner eagerly waiting for Dick Mendham, who had invited her to go to the theater with him. Mary wondered why she was so feverishly eager for the time of his arrival to come. Then as she walked beside him and later sat beside him in the subway going to the theater she reflected to herself that he looked much more attractive away from school. And coming back after the theater that night Richard Mendham asked Mary to be his wife. Mary accepted him at once.

"I never dreamed that you would have me—at least not right away," Dick told her, and Mary was wondering how much Miss Graham's advice had had to do with her quick decision. He was the first man who asked her and she had accepted him. They planned to be married in the summer after school was over and Dick told Mary that he would never consent to her teaching after they were married. He himself was giving up teaching when the summer came. He had a position waiting for him in a schoolbook publishing company and had been teaching for two years to fit himself for this work. His uncle was the president of the concern and wanted someone who knew the public-school system.

In June Mary told Miss Graham of her engagement.

"Not Dick Mendham," said she amazed. "What made you accept him?"

"You did," said Mary, her eyes glowing. "You told me to accept the first man that proposed. And I want to thank you for your very good advice."

EXPERIENCE OF WESTERN GIRL
Found Cannery Work Too Tiring

The fertile valleys of Oregon help to supply the tables of America. This is possible through the magic of the humble tin can.

In one of the canning establishments, Julia Schmidt was employed. It was complicated work because she did sealing and other parts of the work. It was strenuous work and she was not a strong girl. Often she forced herself to work when she was hardly able to sit at her machine. At times she would have to stay at home for she was so weak she could hardly walk. For five years she was in this weakened condition.

She tried various medicines. At last, a friend of hers spoke of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and she gave it a trial.

"Everyone says I am a healthier and stronger girl," she writes. "I am recommending the Vegetable Compound to all my friends who tell me how they suffer and I am willing to answer letters from women asking about it." Julia Schmidt's address is 652 North Front St., Salem, Oregon.

Girls who work in factories know just how Miss Schmidt felt. Perhaps they, too, will find better health by taking the Vegetable Compound.

Drink Water to Help Wash Out Kidney Poison

If Your Back Hurts or Bladder Bothers You, Begin Taking Salts

When your kidneys hurt and your back feels sore don't get scared and proceed to load your stomach with a lot of drugs that excite the kidneys and irritate the entire urinary tract. Keep your kidneys clean like you keep your bowels clean, by flushing them with a mild, harmless salts which helps to remove the body's urinous waste and stimulates them to their normal activity. The function of the kidneys is to filter the blood. In 24 hours they strain from it 500 grains of acid and waste, so we can readily understand the vital importance of keeping the kidneys active.

Drink lots of good water—you can't drink too much; also get from any pharmacist about four ounces of Jad Salts; take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast each morning for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help clean and stimulate clogged kidneys; also to neutralize the acids in the system so they are no longer a source of irritation, thus often relieving bladder weakness.

Jad Salts is inexpensive, cannot injure; makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink, which everyone should take now and then to help keep their kidneys clean and active. Try this; also keep up the water drinking, and no doubt you will wonder what became of your kidney trouble and backache.

The manly part is to do with might and main what you can do.—Emerson.

ANOTHER WOMAN'S SACRIFICE

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman.)

NURSE WINIFRED stood beside Muriel's cot in the children's ward, waiting for the doctor's verdict.

"I'm afraid we'll have to send her home tomorrow," he said at last. "That hip disease is completely cured. It has been for weeks, you know. We've kept the child principally—well, because you have taken a fancy to her," he said, smilingly.

"I like them all," said the nurse. "But this little five-year-old—poor little motherless thing! Doctor, I don't like to think of that father of hers taking her."

"I'm afraid he's got the law on his side," the doctor answered. "Besides, what's the matter with him?"

"I don't like him, doctor," answered the nurse. "I don't think he's the sort of man who would be kind to a child."

"Nonsense!" said the doctor, brusquely. "Anyhow, she can't stay here forever."

"Just one week longer!" pleaded Nurse Winifred.

"Very well. One week. But no longer," said the doctor, as he turned away.

Nurse Winifred felt the tears come into her eyes. She had mothered Muriel Clauson ever since the child had been brought there by the father, a year before. The mother was dead; the father, who came every week, seemed to like the little girl after his fashion, but Nurse Winifred did not like him. Dark, scowling, sullen, he never noticed her, never did anything but sit by the cot side and glower at his child, who was plainly almost afraid of him.

When Muriel learned that she was to go home with her father in the near future she was heartbroken.

"Promise me you'll come too, nurse," she pleaded. And Nurse Winifred, to save the child a week of heartbreak, promised that she would.

She broke the news to the father the next day. He only glared at her morosely. She found herself wondering whether he would know how to care for the child, whether there were any women in his family. He was a maker of stained glass, she had learned, and lived in two or three poorly furnished rooms in an unfashionable, rather Bohemian part of the town. Still, a father has rights. But Nurse Winifred felt that it would be scandalous to let the child go to a home where there would be no woman to care for it.

"I suppose you will get some one to look after the child," she suggested.

"I am capable of looking after her," answered the father.

"But you want a woman to care for her. You can't look after a child yourself!"

"I'll have no woman in my home," he almost shouted at her.

"You'll have to," answered Nurse Winifred deliberately. "Otherwise—you shall not get possession of the child."

"Maybe you'd like to look after her yourself!" jeered the man.

Nurse Winifred flushed. "I certainly should," she answered quietly. "However, that is not the point. I shall speak to the hospital authorities."

And she took the matter up with them. They agreed that it might be possible to have the child committed to an institution. "But it wouldn't be wise," was the verdict. "No doubt the father will prove amenable to reason. You see, the poor are suspicious, and it would give the hospital a bad name."

The nurse retired, completely baffled. She thought about the matter all day, and cried most of the night. Then she arrived at her decision. When the father came she told him plainly that she was willing to give up her spare time to the child. She would come for a couple of hours daily; if he was unwilling she would have the child taken from him.

The man looked at her with dull rage. He had not dreamed that she would take him at his word.

"Well, I guess I can stand it for two hours a day," he answered at length.

When the time came for the child's removal she accompanied him in a cab to where he lived. It was a cozy little apartment, not nearly so bad as she had imagined. It consisted of five rooms, and the nurse was sure, the moment she set eyes on it, that a woman had had a part in the furnishing. Perhaps it was the dead mother. She pitied her devoutly. Then, being a practical woman, Nurse Winifred at once set about preparing for the child's life in the flat.

"You'll have to have a crib," she said.

The man pulled out a roll of bills and handed her fifty dollars. "Order what you want," he said curtly.

That was the beginning of the strange experience. The man's workroom was at the end of the flat, a large room filled with glass of all shapes and sizes. Angels' heads started out from between strips of lead. The floor was splashed with coloring. When the nurse came Clauson shut himself up and refused to see her.

Weeks passed. They hardly ever met. Clauson had given her a key and knew her hours. She would hear him at work in his room as she tended Muriel. Gradually she began to see that a certain affection had sprung up between the child and the father. She began to pity the lonely man. Once, when they met, she showed this sympathy, and she fancied that the look in his eyes was like that of a dog, starving for affection. But then the mask fell again, and he was gruffer than ever when they next met.

One day, as she was leaving, he came in and stood beside her.

"Well, how long is this going on?" he asked.

"As long as I am needed," she answered with spirit.

The man seemed suddenly to change. "Sit down a minute," he said. "I want to tell you that—that I am not ungrateful for what you have done. You are fond of the child. But you don't know what she means to me. I—I want to explain my rudeness."

"It will take a lot of explaining," thought Nurse Winifred; but she only waited for what he was going to say.

"I want to tell you," he continued, "that the child's mother is still alive."

"Then why don't you bring her?" demanded Nurse Winifred, starting up in consternation.

"Because she wouldn't come," he answered. She never wanted the child. She hated the idea of giving life to her. She only cared for—society, and such things."

"Oh!" murmured the nurse, beginning to sense something of the tragedy.

"I wrote to her after she had left me. She ran away—she left a note for me saying that she couldn't live in poverty. I was not successful then. It was hard work to live. But she never cared for the child. I wrote to her, begging her to come back for her sake. But she refused. She secured a divorce from me in the West and married a rich man. The child meant nothing to her and does not remember her.

"After that experience I hated all women. I vowed that no woman should ever enter my home again. I resolved to bring up the child alone, to try to make her better than her mother was. But she had to go to the hospital, and, and—"

"I understand," answered Nurse Winifred gently.

"Then, when you came here I determined never to see you. But you showed me that there were some women who were different. And I am sorry. I know how you have given all your spare time in spite of the work in the hospital. So I want to make you a suggestion. I am not fit to care for the child. Take her away and bring her up as yours. I will pay you. I am doing well, and I can sign an agreement—"

"Nonsense, Mr. Clauson," answered the nurse promptly. "I am willing to continue coming here. Muriel likes me, and—it is my greatest happiness."

Her eyes filled with tears. He made no answer, but went out of the room quickly.

But after that she had, more and more frequently, glimpses of the real man beneath the mask of indifference and selfishness. It was a slow process. It began when they put their heads together to plan for the girl's welfare. But it might have been infinitely slow had not Nurse Winifred suddenly failed to appear one afternoon.

The next day Clauson was at the hospital. They told him that she had been struck down with pneumonia from overwork; that there was no chance for her.

Nurse Winifred, lying in a coma, was wholly ignorant of the man who sat beside her bed. He had been there from morn till night for seven days.

"There is one chance in a hundred," the doctor said. "It is the critical period. If she awakens . . . but she is not likely to awaken."

As the angels of death and life struggled with one another the sound of a man's grief reached the nurse's mind in its misty recesses. Faintly she opened her eyes.

"Live!" he was whispering. "Live for Muriel—and me."

With all her effort she focused her consciousness upon the words.

"Yes! I will live!" she whispered back.

Might Have Gone on With the Quotation

"By the way, knowing my great admiration for Lord Beaconsfield, tales and anecdotes connected with him were often brought to me by friends who knew how gladly I should hear them. Here is one told me by the late duke of Sutherland whom I used to see a great deal of when he was at Stafford and had a flat in Ryder street. Dining at the Guildhall shortly after becoming prime minister, Disraeli was thus addressed by the facetious lord mayor:

"One may say in the words of Banquo in Macbeth: 'Thou hast it now—king, Cawdor, Glamis, all, as the weird women promised.'"

"Very appropriate," exclaimed Bernal Osborne, who never forgot nor forgave the dagger thrust spoken of in my "Uncensored Recollections," "but why didn't he go on?"

"Go on—why?" asked Stafford.

Bernal grinned and replied: "Why, the next words are, 'and I fear thou play'dst most foully for it.'"—From "More Uncensored Recollections," Anonymous.

Their Identity

"As we were coming along the road from the westward," we remarked, "we observed one man picking up a few small gravel, two more men listlessly pitching pennies and three other men asleep in the shade."

WORTH SAVING?

Two reasons why you should buy Christmas Seals are John and Donald (shown in the picture above), 20 month old patients at the Children's building, Glen Lake Sanatorium, Hopkins. These sturdy tots, who were born of tuberculous mothers at the sanatorium, are convincing evidence of the truth of the campaign war-cry "Tuberculosis is not hereditary; tuberculosis can be prevented."

These children were taken from their mothers at birth and placed in the Children's building, where every precaution was taken to protect them from infection and to build them up. Today, Indian-brown of body from sun treatment, apple red of cheek, and in perfect physical condition, John and Donald could claim prizes in any health contest.

Because there are hundreds of children in Minnesota exposed to tuberculosis infection and for whom no perventive measures are being taken, an urgent appeal for more generous contributions in this year's Christmas Seal sale is being made.

Heavenly Host—A choir of the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eight grades, will sing Christmas songs and chants in connection with the play.

This brings out the Christmas spirit and portrays the story of the birth of Christ.

— Christmas Seal Your Mail —

The eight grade reading class is studying Dickens' "Christmas Carol." This story is very appropriate at this time, because it shows the real spirit of Christmas giving and sacrifice.

The drawing classes have finished a drawing dealing with buildings. Two ancient forms of architecture were studied and drawed. They are the ancient fort and the Chinese or Japanese Pagoda.

The Latin class will write a Latin theme on one of the last days of this week. The topic for this theme will be "The Queen of Roumania in America."

Considerable repairing has been done on our heating system over the week end. Some old leaky radiators were repaired and also some new ones were added to the system. This repairing together with the carload of coal just placed in the coal shed ought to keep us comfortable for the next two months.

Quite often you hear some patrons wonder why their test vary so much. This question of test variation is one of the main causes for some patrons to actually believe the buttermaker is intentionally underreading their test. Whether you believe me or not, I am here to tell you that the patron that thinks such is the case is absolutely wrong. There is a possibility of a mistake, every human being makes mistakes, but let me tell you they are few and quite easely found upon rechecking a patrons weight of cream and test. Is it not unreasonable to believe a buttermaker would have to cut your test in order to get you down on him, all he would get out of it is trouble for him self and dissatisfaction in general among the rest of the patrons. You never will realize how bad the buttermaker feels when your test goes down and the patron can see no cause for it, until you yourself should some day be in charge of a creamery.

Some patrons have an idea they have a check on their buttermaker when an occasional can of cream is taken to another creamery, or very likely a cream station, without their buttermakers knowledge. In my mind this way of checking-up on your buttermaker is worthless, and to be truthful about it, you have gained nothing and on the other hand you have neglected to patronize your own creamery and very likely you helped some centralizer in selling your cream to a cream station where you get from three to six cents at least less than if you stood by your own creamery one hundred per cent. The average patron that believes in checking up on their creamery manager in this way does not realize just how little he finds out and I am sure he does not think into the future as much as he should when he does go to a cream station with his cream This news is worth some serious thinking and how much better wouldn't it be if all the patrons cooperated with their buttermaker in finding out their test as well as other troubles. We are open for a bawling-out and perhaps need it but, let it be to my face and I assure you the wrong can be righted the quickest and best way.

As the southbound mail now goes half hour earlier, all letters and parcels must be mailed by two o'clock.

From now on it will be impossible to wait on both village and country people between trains, therefore those in and near town should mail their letters and parcels and get their money orders in the forenoon.

The mails will now be so crowded that parcels will travel very slowly until the Christmas rush is over. All parcels should be mailed early enough so that ordinarly they would reach their destination a full week before Christmas. Perhaps then they may get there on time. Mark parcels "Do not open until Christmas." Parcels will not be delivered on Christmas day as all postoffices close at noon.

Praise Became Reproach

The word "Hun" was a term of reproach given to the Germans by their enemies from the beginning of the World war. It seems to have first been associated by William II with his army as a term of praise. He used it in an address to his troops about to sail for China from Bremerhaven, July 27, 1900. For many years the German Socialists used the word "Hun" in attacking the militarists in that country.

HEALTH FIRST

"Help find tuberculosis cases early" is the appeal of Minnesota sanatorium physicians, who complain that only a small percentage of patients seek treatment when the disease is in its early and most curable stages, in urging more generous contributions to the Christmas Seal sale.

How the anti-tuberculosis program is attempting to meet this need is shown in the above picture, which was taken at one of the Christmas Seal free clinics held during the past year. More than 8,000 men, women, and children were examined at the Minnesota free clinics financed by the penny seals during 1926. Still more clinics are needed, according to anti-tuberculosis leaders, and the extent of the work next near depends only on the success of the seal sale.

"Virtually every case of tuberculosis if discovered early and treated properly and long enough will recover," says Dr. H. Longstreet Taylor of the Minnesota Public Health Association. "Free Clinics seem to be the most effective way of discovering the early cases and teaching people the value of periodic medical examinations."

The Way of a MAID with a MAN

STORY FROM THE START

Cesare Borgia, duke of Valentinois, Italy, is having difficulties with his mercenaries. He has just finished crushing several of his powerful rivals, the job having been completed with the ruthlessness which only he knew how to employ. One of his enemies, however, seems to have escaped, and Cesare is uneasy. This is Matteo Orsini. It is believed that he is in hiding with his recluse kinsman, Almerico, at Pievano. Cesare seeks the right man to find Matteo. Cesare dispatches one of his followers, Pantaleone degli Uberti, with a small troop, to Pievano, to spy out the situation and to capture Orsini. Pretending that he is wounded, Pantaleone gains entrance to Pievano.

Thus Messer Pantaleone first beheld her, and since his taste in women was of the rude sort that craves for swelling amplitudes of form, his questing glance passed on without reluctance to rake the shadows of that noble chamber, looking for another who was not present.

"Why are you come to me?" Almerico asked him with inscrutable simplicity.

"Why?" Messer Pantaleone blinked as though the oddness of the question afforded him surprise. "Because you are an Orsini, and because my cause is the cause of the Orsini." He proceeded to explain himself. "Paolo Orsini was my friend."

"Was?" The question came sharply from Madonna Fulvia.

Pantaleone fetched a deep sigh, and sank together like a man in the uttermost depths of dejection. "I see you have not heard. Yet I should have thought that by now such evil news had traveled o'er the face of all Italy. Paolo was strangled yesterday at Assisi, and with him was strangled too the duke of Gravina."

The old man uttered a sharp cry. He half-arose from his seat, supporting himself upon trembling arms; then, bereft of strength, he sank back again.

"God's curse upon me who am the bearer of ill tidings," growled the crafty Pantaleone savagely.

But the old man, recovering from his momentary collapse under the shock of that news, reproved him for his words, whilst Monna Fulvia stood immobile and rigid in grief.

"That is not yet all," Pantaleone pursued, as if defending himself against Lord Almerico's reproof. "From Rome comes news that the cardinal is in a dungeon of Sant' Angelo, that Giangiordano is taken, together with Santacroce and I know not whom besides. We know what mercy the Borgia will display. He will never rest as long as in the House of Orsini one stone remains upon another."

"Then will he never rest, indeed," said Monna Fulvia proudly.

"I pray so, Madonna, devoutly do I pray it—I who was Paolo Orsini's friend and who to my undying shame have served the Borgia tyrant with him. For that—because Valentinois knows that if I served him it was but because I served Orsini and that I am to be reckoned as of the Orsini's family—I am now proscribed and hunted, and if I am taken I shall perish as Paolo and Gravina perished and as men say that Matteo Orsini perished too."

In nothing perhaps does the craft of the man appear so starkly as in this probing statement. As he spoke these words he watched father and daughter closely, seeming but to consider them with eyes of concern and pity. He saw the sudden movement of astonishment that neither could repress. Then came the girl's question, laden with a sudden and betraying eagerness.

"Do men say that?" she cried, her eyes kindling and her bosom quickening in her faint excitement.

"It is the common talk," said that swindler sorrowfully. "I pray God and the saints it be untrue."

"Indeed . . ." Almerico began gravely, as if to reassure him, and then caution supervening, he abruptly checked. Unworldly and guileless though he might be, yet some knowledge of his fellow man had come to him with his years, and this fugitive inspired him with little trust, awakening in him an unusual caution. Obeying it, he altered the tone and current of his phrase. "I thank you, sir, for that prayer."

But Pantaleone, accounting himself answered, concluded that Cesare Borgia's suspicions were correct, and that Matteo Orsini was in hiding here in Pievano or hereabouts. He reasoned syllogistically. The woman who loved Matteo Orsini would not have received the news of his death with such equanimity had she not been positively assured that he was living. Such assurance in such times nothing short of the man's presence at Pievano could afford.

Wearing outwardly his mask of dejection, Messer Pantaleone's treacherour heart rejoiced in this assurance that he was hot upon the trail, and that soon Matteo Orsini and a thousand ducats would be his.

But now he had to submit to questionings from his host. Almerico's mistrust demanded to know more of him.

"You are from Assisi?" he inquired.

"From the lord duke of Valentinois' camp there," answered the emissary.

"And you fled incontinently when they strangled Paolo and Gravina?"

"Not so." Messer Pantaleone saw the trap. In a game of wits he was a match for any ten such recluse students as the lord of Pievano. "That, as I have said, was yesterday—before Cesare Borgia had proof of my devotion to the Orsini. But for that same devotion and the need to act upon it, I might have remained a captain in the tyrant's service. But it happened that I knew of Valentinois' designs upon Petrucci at Siena. I attempted to send a letter of warning to Petrucci. That letter was intercepted, and I had but time to get to horse before the hangman's grooms should come to fetch me. I rode that beast to death a league from here. My notion was to get to Siena and Petrucci; but, being unhorsed and in hourly danger of capture, I bethought me that I would turn aside and seek sanctuary here. Yet, my lord, he ended rising with elaborate show of physical pain and difficulty, "if so be you think that by my presence I shall draw down upon you Valentinois' vengeful justice, then—" He gathered his cloak about him, like a man about to take his leave.

"A moment, sir—a moment," said Almerico, hesitating; and he put forth a hand to stay the soldier.

"What matters Valentinois?" cried the girl, and quick anger blazed in her eyes, transmuting them into fiery sapphires. "Who fears him? We were base, indeed, did we let you suffer for your generous impulse, sir, to turn you hence who have been our kinsman's friend. While there is a roof on Pievano you may sleep tranquilly under it."

Don Almerico shifted in his chair and grunted as she brought that impulsive speech to its conclusion. His daughter went too fast, he thought. He spread a white transparent hand to the blazing logs, and with the other stroked his shaven chin cogitating.

Then looking squarely at the stranger:

"What is your name, sir?" he asked him bluntly.

"I am called Pantaleone degli Uberti," said the adventurer, who had enough worldly wisdom never to make use of lies where truth could be employed with safety.

"An honorable name," the old man murmured, nodding as to himself. "Well, well! I will leave it, sir, to your discretion not to tarry at Pievano longer than need be. I think not of myself. "He shrugged and smiled deprecatingly, a smile of singular charm that illumined as with a light of lingering youth within the venerable old face. I am too old to weigh the paltry sum of life remaining me against a service due to an honorable man. But there is this child to consider and the risk of your discovery here—"

But at that she interrupted him, breaking in with the impulsiveness of her generous youth and womanly compassion.

"Who runs great risks may disregard such lesser ones," she cried, whereat Ser Pantaleone became all ears.

"By the Host, not so," her father answered. "We dare add nothing at present to draw attention upon ourselves. You see—"

He checked under the suddenly tightened curb of reawakening caution, and his eyes flashed keenly upon his visitor.

But Pantaleone's face was dull and wooden, a mask betraying nothing of his inward satisfaction. For his quick wits had without difficulty completed the lord of Pievano's broken sentence, and found it confirming the assurance he had already formed of Matteo Orsini's presence there.

Pantaleone's scheme seems to be working beautifully. Is he cleverer than Cesare thought?

The Domesday Books

When Queen Victoria came to the throne the national archives were scattered in about sixty places, but by an act passed in 1838 they were concentrated in the public record office, which now contains records of the chancery, exchequer, various courts, and departments of state such as the treasury, home office, foreign office, war office, admiralty, board of trade and customs.

Amongst the principal exhibits are the Domesday books, that are the outcome of a general survey of England ordered by William the Conqueror at the end of 1085.—London Answers.

Death-House Joke

Not long ago a guard in the death house became suspicious because the man in the death cell was so quiet. He investigated. His prisoner, who was to die for murder within six hours, was busy lettering a cardboard sign with charred matches. He was marking out these letters: "Room to Let."—Capper's Weekly.

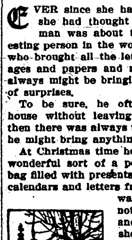
The POSTMAN and CHRISTMAS

by MARY GRAHAM BONNER

Ever since she had been a child she had thought that the postman was about the most interesting person in the world. He it was who brought all the letters and packages and papers and magazines, who always might be bringing any number of surprises.

To be sure, he often passed the house without leaving anything, but then there was always the chance that he might bring anything.

At Christmas time he was the most wonderful sort of a person, with his bag filled with presents and cards and calendars and letters from friends she was sure would not forget her, and from friends she was so pleased had not forgotten her.



Sometimes he brought just the most delicious mail of all—sometimes he brought a fruit cake, or a box of candy that a friend of hers had made.

So it was that she, Minnie, had always loved postmen in general, and now it seemed as though she were being particularly fond of one postman in particular. He was on their route and he often came in and chatted after the day's work was over.

She had gone to school with him and she had always liked him. The old postman was a dear—no matter how many bundles he was carrying at Christmas time he always seemed to be happy that his load was heavy, because it meant just that much more joy along the route.

But he had retired and now every Christmas they took his present to him and sat and chatted with him and with his wife, who always brought out her Christmas cake to be shared by all.

She had not been displeased when the schoolday friend had been given this route.

Not displeased at all.

Ray was tall and very good-looking. She thought he looked so well in his postman's uniform. And certainly he seemed a little interested in her.

She was not displeased in this.

Not displeased at all.

Christmas Day, he had said, there would be no mail delivery. So she was a little surprised to see him coming down the street and up the steps of their house.

"I wonder if we're going to have mail after all," she said to herself. It hadn't occurred to her that he was not in his postman's uniform, and that he was coming just to see her. To be sure, he stopped in when he was off duty, but she had never quite felt he was so much interested in her as that he enjoyed the whole family. She did belong to such a nice family, so jolly and cordial and friendly as they all were, and such fun.

And then it was all so clear, as they sat before the fire that Christmas afternoon, that he was interested in her—very, very much interested in her. More so than she had even thought or hoped or dreamed.

In fact, he told her all about it.

And she was not displeased.

Not displeased at all.

Nor was he displeased.

Not displeased at all.

For she agreed that to be a postman's wife was not such a bad idea, and that, apart from everything else, it would be so particularly nice to know that the postman was going to come to one's house every single day in the whole year—to their own house.

And, as she said, it was such fun being engaged to a postman in the Christmas season.

He had not been too busy to think of her!

JIM AND HIS DECISION

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman.)

Jim Bennett sat on the sand of Tan-tan island and looked out across the sea, as he had done each day for more than a year. Everybody in Tan-tan knew Jim Bennett, and the raggedest beachcomber sneered when his name was mentioned. It was not so much the depths to which he had fallen as the fact that he had fallen so far.

Three years ago he had left San Francisco to make his fortune in the South seas and had come back to marry Elsie Dale. But her father was many times a millionaire, and had other ideas for Elsie's future. Everything depended, then, on Jim's making good on the copra trading trip, in which he had sunk his little capital.

At least, so far as marrying Elsie was concerned. Her father would never consent. Jim knew Jack Dale too well to hope for that. But if the trip succeeded Jim could afford to bear the old man's enmity, and Elsie had said she would.

The ship was wrecked on an uncharted reef off Tan-tan. Jim saw his little capital lost. He had barely the fare home. Despair took hold of him, then the lethargy of the life in the little place. He had sunk down and down. He had at last written to Elsie releasing her—and had forgotten.

He had quite forgotten by the time Elsie's letter arrived. She had told him that she was going to wait three years. If at the end of that time he did not claim her, she would feel free. But she loved him; let him remember that every day of his life.

At the end of the first year Jim remembered it occasionally. He was employed in one of the island resorts. At the end of the second year he had a hazy recollection. Then he was doing odd jobs along the wharf. At the end of the third year, when he was nothing but a beachcomber, he remembered again, this time more clearly.

He remembered it when the monthly vessel arrived. He expected that it would carry a letter for him. No letter had been at the post office; and yet, when Jim looked up and saw a young, athletic American, neatly dressed, with sun helmet and blue glasses, approaching him, he was sure that he had come upon business concerning Elsie.

Jim looked up lazily from among the little group of fellow loafers, and wondered how any man could find the energy to walk at that gait in such a sun. The young man drew up to the group and stopped.

"Any of you men know a fellow named Jim Bennett?" he inquired.

The man nearest Jim nudged him lazily; the rest did not even shift their eyes from the far horizon.

"I'm Jim Bennett," said Jim, rising. He saw the astonishment upon the young man's face.

"Will you please come over here?" asked the stranger.

He led him about fifty yards away, out of the hearing of the others. He might have saved himself the trouble, for those who were not asleep in the shade had already forgotten Jim's existence. When they stood together upon the sand the young man took Jim by the shoulders and swung him round, facing him.

"Are you Jim Bennett or are you lying?" he demanded, in crisp, nervous accents.

For an instant Jim felt the resentment that would have come to any normal man at such treatment; but then he remembered that he had left his manhood behind him at Tan-tan town.

"I'm Jim Bennett," he answered doggedly. "What do you want with me?"

The other breathed hard. "Where do you come from?" he demanded. "I must have proofs of what you say. Who is the woman to whom you are engaged?"

"You mean Miss Dale, I suppose," drawled Jim, and the other let his hands drop from his shoulders and stared at him hopelessly.

"Are you crazy or sunstruck?" he inquired presently.

"Usually both," answered Jim truthfully. "Today, as it happens, I haven't found anyone willing to give me the price. How about you?"

The young man clapped him on the shoulder.

"Listen to me," he said quietly. "You must have been a man once, from all I've heard of you. I recognize you now from your photograph, although that beard makes you look quite different. Miss Dale's father is dead. He has left her his whole fortune. She wanted me to come and find you and bring you back to her. She loves you, and pride doesn't count. She knows what you must have been through, and she's going to ask you to marry her, once she gets you at her side. Understand?"

Jim understood. The thought of the Dale millions at his command was paralyzing; it galvanized him into life. He looked up, to see the young man reading his face.

"Here's ten dollars!" he said suddenly. "No—wait!" He pulled out the pocketbook again. "Here's a hundred. Do you think you can get washed and cleaned and have a new suit and good linen on your back, ready to sail on the ship tomorrow?"

[illegible] pocketed the money mechanically. "I suppose so," he muttered. "What's your hurry?"

"Because," said the other gravely. "Miss Dale is on board. That's why. And the best man in the world couldn't deserve your luck."

Somehow the new clothes, the luxury of a bath, had put new manhood into Jim. He lay in bed early in the morning in the hotel and speculated what he would do with the Dale millions. He would go to San Francisco, of course. He would build a palace there. He would have automobiles, fine clothes, cigars, all the physical luxuries which he had been denied so long. And—he would marry Elsie at the first opportunity, to keep his hold on her.

He got up and dressed. He was just about to leave the room when the young man entered. He surveyed Jim with a grimmer smile than before.

"You haven't shaved off your beard," he said.

"No," said Jim thoughtfully. "It looks—more manly, I think."

The other looked at him in contempt. It penetrated the man's skin. Jim winced. It was the first moment of self-realization in many a year.

"Why have you done all this for me?" he asked, looking at the other curiously. "Do you know, I believe—I believe you are in love with Elsie yourself."

"Miss Dale from you, please," replied the other. "Yes, I am in love with her, if you wish to know it. And if I hadn't found you I think she would have married me."

"Then why did you find me?" muttered Jim.

The other choked down an expletive. "If you're ready," he said coldly, "we'll start right away."

Jim went out with him. And now, surveyed by the curious inhabitants of the little settlement, the target of their sneering glances, Jim felt suddenly more ashamed than he had ever felt before in all his life. And for the first time he really understood the depths of his degradation.

He had been a worthless beachcomber, while she had waited for him, believed in him. He was utterly worthless. He could not degrade that pure life to the level of his own. He had thought of nothing but the Dale millions, nothing at all of the love that had been true to him.

Unconsciously he held his head higher and flung back the scornful gestures, the looks, the thinly-veiled jeers. They should learn some day that there was that spark of manhood in him which would kindle the old fires!

He knew that his past was utterly dead. And so, walking at the side of his companion, he boarded the boat.

There was a delay, a brief delay. The young man turned to him and said:

"Remember, Bennett, my lips are sealed forever. You have your own future and hers to make or mar. I know her love for you, and that is why I shall remain silent. Can you honor it? Promise me that from this day forward you will strive with might and main to be worthy of her."

"I promise," answered Jim humbly, and the man at his side looked at him strangely. This seemed to be a new man—he had known nothing of him.

Along the deck came a white-robed figure, tripping gladly. Jim knew her at once. All his heart went out to her. Elsie had not changed a bit during those three years, except that there was more of the woman in her poise, her thoughtful eyes, and just as much of the happy girl in her smiling face.

"John!" she exclaimed. "Where—where is Jim, then? And who is this gentleman?"

Suddenly Jim realized that she had not recognized him. His tan, his beard, the ineffaceable marks of those three years on his face. . . .

He turned a little away.

"Jim died last week," he said quietly. "We didn't dare to break the news to you at once. He died—I was his friend—he wanted me to tell you."

He turned and walked with steady steps to the ship's gangway, and along the wharf.

Writer Has Brief for Much Maligned Goat

Because the goat is whimsical in appearance and, in its kidling state, spry and full of antics, it is singled out as an animal to be made a pet of. Therefore it is often found that people without proper facilities will attempt to keep a goat. If dogs ate vegetables how many gardens would be ruined in a day with all the dogs we have at large! Why should the goat, above all animals, be expected to "Keep off the grass" and travel in the narrow path of animal virtue? It is often said that the goat is difficult to fence against, but this is erroneous. The fence that will hold a sheep will hold a goat. The only difference is that if there is a hole in the fence depend upon the goat's wit to find it, while the sheep may pass it unseen. An ordinary milk goat, carrying a normal udder, has no desire to entangle herself in a fence; provided with proper food she will not crave the exaggerated items of fare sometimes put down as her food.—Montreal Family Herald.

FORMER PRINCESS DOES SCRUBBING

Likes Housework Better Than Life at Court.

Berlin.—Scrubbing floors as an avocation is infinitely preferable to sitting in the princely halls of Potsdam, says Princess Alexandra Victoria, the divorced wife of Prince August Wilhelm, the former kaiser's fourth son.

The princess, who is now the wife of former Commander Ruemann of the Imperial navy, recently was found cleaning floors by a prominent Berlin lawyer who unexpectedly called upon her at her home in Munich.

"No doubt you are surprised to see me doing housework," the princess said, with a smile, "but, believe me, I am a thousand times happier managing my own home and supporting myself than I ever was when breathing the muggy air at the Potsdam court."

Princess Alexandra, who is a princess of Schleswig-Holstein by birth and a niece of the late Empress Augusta Victoria, depends on her artistic skill for her livelihood, as her husband, who is a simple bourgeois, has no fortune, but merely his officer's pension. During a recent exhibit at a fashionable Berlin hotel her landscapes and portraits brought favorable comment from critics.

The princess' Munich home is a snug, comfortable apartment, in which, as a typical German hausfrau, she does her own housework and cooking. Since her divorce in 1920 and her remarriage in 1922 the only cloud that has marred the happiness of this democratic princess, who is almost forty and is still famed for her beauty, is a longing for her only son, thirteen-year-old Prince Alexander.

The boy was awarded to Prince August Wilhelm by the court, in accordance with German custom, and is being raised with the third and fourth sons of the former crown prince at Potsdam.

Find Sand Fly Carries Deadly Kala-azar Germs

London, England.—The cause of the spread of kala-azar, a highly fatal malady of the Orient, similar to malaria, is being tracked down by a British commission organized for the study of this disease.

It is indicated by extensive experiments that a species of sand fly carries the minute organism that is its immediate cause. An Indian representative of the bedbugs and a mosquito of the same family as the one that transmits malaria have been incriminated in the distribution of kala-asar in previous investigations.

It is of the utmost importance, say medical authorities, that the ways of transmission of the fever be known without delay, so that steps can be taken to check it. It is a serious menace in both Assam and India, in the thickly settled sections where the population runs over 1,500 individuals to the square mile.

The real frequency of the disease, according to the commission, is rarely apparent until centers for its treatment are opened in rural districts.

Swiss Citizen's Sword His Passport at Polls

Glaris, Switzerland.—The family sword which he brings with him to the polls is proof a citizen of the cantons of Glaris, Oppenzell, Unterwald and Lehmetz is entitled to vote. Where the family sword has been lost, the voter appears with a bayonet. His vote is never challenged.

On election days inhabitants of these cantons meet in the open air and discuss the event. Bearing the swords their fathers, grandfathers or earlier ancestors used in defense of their country, the gathering resembles mobilization for war much more than a political meeting.

A republic for more than a thousand years, Switzerland is a country of ancient traditions. The electors of these four cantons meeting to discuss a referendum on the sale of wines and beer do so with all the warlike setting of their forefathers.

Helium Valuable

Washington.—Helium, which enables airships to go up safely, also helps divers to go down farther safely. Mixed with their oxygen it averts the "bends." The bureau of mines discovered this new utility of the rare gas.

"Last Confederate Mother" Still Living

Dunn, N. C.—"The last Confederate mother" is not dead, as was reported in a recent dispatch from a Virginia city.

Mrs. Julia Anne Pridgen of near Moore's Creek Bridge, Pender county, now in her one hundred and third year, is the mother of a Confederate soldier—M. B. Pridgen, now deceased. He was her oldest son. Her second son was within the draft age at the close of the Civil war and was about to join the colors when the war ended.

Mrs. Pridgen still enjoys good health, and can walk unaided. She is the mother of 12 children, six of whom are living, the youngest being sixty. She was born November 3, 1823. She was three years old when John Adams and Thomas Jefferson died July 4, 1826.

MANY REGIMENTS HAVE THEIR SONGS

Music Helpful in Keeping Up Morale.

Washington.—The American soldier is a singing warrior. On the march, in the barracks or camp, or even going into action, he raises his voice in melodious harmony with his comrades in the rendition of popular airs, according to the United States Army Recruiting News. Music is an important factor in keeping up the morale of a combatant organization. Regular song leaders are used in training camps and soldiers are encouraged to lend their voices to mass singing.

Have Own Songs.

Many regiments in the present-day army have songs and ballads peculiarly their own, airs which are known as that particular organization's very own. Some of these songs have been written especially or adapted by the regimental band for state occasions. Three regiments have distinctive ballads set to the tune of "The Girl I Left Behind Me," "Semper Fidelis," and "Annie Laurie." One regiment, the Forty-second infantry, made up of enlisted men from Porto Rico, has for its march "Ecos de Borinquen," whose name indicates its origin, Borinquen being the old Indian name for Porto Rico.

Two organizations, the Thirty-fourth infantry and the Eleventh infantry, use a march called "Le Regiment de Sambre et Meuse," in commemoration of their having fought along those streams in the World war. One regiment, the Forty-fifth infantry, stationed in the Phillippines, has adopted a march of Spanish origin called "Alerta Voluntarios." Another regiment uses the tune of the French "National Defile March."

Among the many regimental marches several deserve special mention. The Seventh infantry, for instance, which has adopted "The Girl I Left Behind Me," first heard this tune played by British bands during the battle of New Orleans in 1815. When the band of the Seventh (then a fife and drum corps) caught the air, they played it also, and the tune was at once recognized as the regimental march of the Seventh infantry. The Seventh was the only regular army regiment in that battle, which was fought after the Treaty of Ghent had been signed. The words were given to the regiment by an Irish officer captured during the engagement.

Legend of "Garry Owen."

"Garry Owen," the stirring regimental march of the Seventh United States cavalry, has a historic legend connected with its inception. In 1868 the troopers of the Seventh were engaged with hostile Cheyennes at Washita, in what is now the state of Wyoming. Attack was to be made at dawn on Chief Black Kettle's Cheyenne Indian village and a special signal for the concerted rush of the cavalry was necessary. "Garry Owen" was played for the first time upon that occasion and the blood-stirring air of that march carried the cavalrymen into the ensuing action against the savage redskins. An interesting historical episode in connection with this march is that it is known to have been General Custer's favorite song and tune. At 5 a. m. on May 17, 1876, during the final parade and review of the Seventh cavalry at Fort Lincoln, the regimental band played this air. This was the march by which General Terry left the fort with the regiment on the expedition to the Little Big Horn which was to end in Custer's massacre.

One other regimental march worth calling attention to is that of the Ninth infantry. The march is called "The Old Ninth Infantry." The music to this song came from the old light opera, "Sergeant Kitty," but the composer of the words is unknown. It is believed to have been first sung at a minstrel show given by the Ninth early in March, 1907.

Of late a custom has been introduced at the United States Military academy at West Point. The cadet band plays various regimental marches at the parades which the cadet corps participates in each evening during clement weather and also at the band concerts on Sundays and holidays. The purpose of this custom is primarily to bring the future commissioned officers of the army into closer touch with the airs of the regiments to which they will be assigned later.

One Cameroon Man Has 98 Wives and 460 None

London.—One man in Bali of the British Cameroons, West Africa, has 98 wives, while on the other hand there are 460 men in the town who have no wives at all.

Another man has 27 wives, while there are seven warriors with 10 mates each, and 350 with but two spouses.

Some of the tribes, says a government report, keep up slavery, witchcraft and trial by ordeal, and generally live in the most primitive conditions. The men in some tribes wear little clothing, and the women none, and it is the women who do all the work.

New York.—Incoming immigrants are now being welcomed with a movie showing the rise of a poor boy, whose handicaps in early life were at least as great as theirs—Abraham Lincoln. Will Hays and Secretary James J. Davis helped inaugurate a new Americanization plan.

BRITAIN SEEKING NEW POWER SOURCE

Growing Shortage of Coal Viewed With Alarm.

London.—Alarmed at the continual dearth of coal, the British public is casting around for substitutes. Alfred J. Liversedge, a well-known engineer, sums up the possibilities of the future:

Coal from China, "cheap as dirt," brought to Europe in "coal clippers" resembling the famous "tea clippers" of an earlier day. Chinese coal, he declares, is close to the surface and is easily mined by the cheapest labor in the world. The day may come when China will flood the world with coal at prices no one else can match.

The huge chalk cliffs of Great Britain may be burnt like coal, but they leave such an enormous deposit of lime of which only a trifling amount could be used for agriculture that chalk is not considered practical.

Doctor Diesel's theory that mankind might grow oil-bearing plants which could be used for fuel.

Sir Charles Parsons, Bt., famous inventor of the Parsons turbine, told the British Association for the Advancement of Science, that we might get all the heat we needed drilling a big hole into the crust of the earth; he thought 12 miles would be deep enough.

Steam from the center of the earth, such as Italy already has.

Atomic power, as envisaged by Sir Oliver Lodge. While the theory seems perfectly sound the mechanical difficulties have thus far proved insuperable.

The electric engineer, A. A. Campbell Swinton, has interested scientists with his contention that the electromagnetic waves from the sun will some day be converted into heat just as a portion of them are now being used in wireless telegraphy.

Oil—but there is very little oil in Britain.

"White coal," or waterpower. This the author regards as practicable but says that Great Britain in this respect, as in oil, cannot compete with other countries enjoying a more abundant supply.

Tides—here is the cheapest possible source of power available in the near future to Great Britain. "No other country is so fortunately situated as Great Britain in respect to tidal power; using it freely and expertly we can once again compete for the markets of the world."

Use Airplane to Reforest Burned Area in Hawaii

Honolulu, Hawaii.—New practical uses for airplanes appear on the horizon every day. This time a plane has been pressed into service to help reforest a burned-over area of several hundred acres in a forest preserve near here.

About 700 pounds of forest tree seeds were sown by airplane in less than an hour over rocky inaccessible country devastated by recent forest fires that would have required an immense amount of time and labor if done by hand, according to reports from the forestry section of the territory of Hawaii.

The aerial sowing was of especial value, say forestry experts, in getting the burned-over area seeded quickly so the young seedlings would have a start ahead of the undesirable weeds and ferns that spring up nearly over night in the tropics. Seeds scattered were from 40 different kinds of trees, natives of India, Africa, Australia and other tropical countries.

German Said to Be Father of 84 Living Children

Berlin.—The story of a man who twice married at seventy-six is the father of 87 children, 84 of whom are living, is reported by a Vienna medical association journal.

Bernard Scheinberg, living near the German border, had 69 children by his first wife, who died at the age of fifty-six, the journal says. Not one was a single birth. There were four quadruplets, seven triplets and sixteen twins. Sixty-seven of the children are living, but he admits having lost count of the grandchildren. Scheinberg's second marriage at the age of fifty-seven was blessed with 18 children, including two sets of triplets. His second wife is still living.

Cow Has Triplets

Denison, Texas.—Triplets were born to a cow owned by J. C. Martin, wealthy dairyman. Each is of normal size and in good condition.

Men Yield to Color: Orange Suede Coats!

London.—Any man who would like to be a hero to his valet should appear in one of the new dinner jackets shown at the shoe and leather fair.

They are made of black suede leather, with orange lapels, with accompanying suede waistcoats in scarlet and other brilliant colors. The men's section also offered:

A gray suede shoe with cross-word puzzle squares worked in white and black glace kid on the uppers.

Dress shoes in colored patent leather.

Studded heels on rainbow-colored dance shoes.

Have Kidneys Examined By Your Doctor

Take Salts to Wash Kidneys if Back Pains You or Bladder Bothers

Flush your kidneys by drinking a quart of water each day, also take salts occasionally, says a noted authority, who tells us that too much rich food forms acids which almost paralyze the kidneys in their efforts to expel it from the blood. They become sluggish and weaken; then you may suffer with a dull misery in the kidney region, sharp pains in the back or sick headache, dizziness, your stomach sours, tongue is coated, and when the weather is bad you have rheumatic twinges. The urine gets cloudy, full of sediment, the channels often get sore and irritated, obliging you to seek relief two or three times during the night.

To help neutralize these irritating acids, to help cleanse the kidneys and flush off the body's urinous waste, get four ounces of Jad Salts from any pharmacy here; take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days, and your kidneys may then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help flush and stimulate sluggish kidneys; also to neutralize the acids in the system so they no longer irritate, thus often relieving bladder weakness.

Jad Salts is inexpensive, cannot injure and makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink.

THE DULL GRAY THREEDECKERS

By DORA MOLLAN

(©, 1924, by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)

MARY closed the outside door behind her, the door which the Deans shared with two other families. It was the ugly gray door of an ugly gray house. As Mary walked down the steep grade of the sidewalk she passed, at regular intervals, other houses as like it as peas in a pod. They cluttered the hill like a litter of huge dingy packing-cases. One hundred, the specifications had called for, three stories high and housing six families each. There were no trees—roots damage walks; no vines—vines "rot wood." Some one had named the hill "Threedeckerdom," and the name stuck. It was the housing development of the Bates Loom works where Mary's father worked—and Mary hated it.

Mary had made plans to pull herself free from this environment, into which she had been born, before her roots took firm hold; and, as the appointed day drew near she found her courage weakening. After all, it meant leaving her father and mother—and Eddie. It was to strengthen her resolution that Mary had set out on that Saturday afternoon's walk.

At the foot of the hill lay a yet more densely populated neighborhood, a section of ancient, dirty houses bulging with children. Here Mary felt the impulse to hug still closer to her slender self the scanty folds of her blue frock.

Now straight ahead loomed a steep hill, crowned with a stately tower of stone modeled after a medieval castle to honor the memory of a famous man. Mary found the beginning of a dirt path at the foot of the hill and followed its winding rise to the top. Before her stood the tower; below her lay the city.

Gaining the battlemented observation platform, whence a spiral stairway led to the tip-top of the tower, Mary paused for a moment's rest. With her back to the city she looked first at the distant mountains. Beyond them, where the sun was already slipping, lay the city where she would find work and begin the struggle for the things she craved.

A sound from below intruded on Mary's thoughts. Footsteps on the stone stairway! Should she hurry to the top, or start down? The October twilight would be short. Yet, if she should start down now she must pass him—for Mary felt sure it was a man.

The footsteps sounded on the last flight of steps now; still Mary stood irresolute.

"Eddie Morrissey!" Relief made Mary's cry one of joyful welcome—and yet, ten minutes before she would have desired anything but his coming.

"Mary! I thought I would find you here! Why is it, Mary? Some force seems to draw me straight to you!" Eddie was a slightly built boy with dreamy brown eyes. He spoke the name, "Mary," as though it were the word he loved best.

"Eddie, don't—please! I want to go to the top just for a few minutes, Eddie, alone. Then we will walk home together."

"That stairway is narrow and steep, Mary; better let me go with you," Eddie persisted. So together they climbed to the very top of the tower. As Mary looked down she felt that dizziness which comes of a great height; felt that horrible desire to fling herself out into space; to fall down—down— She closed her eyes. Her body swayed. Then came Eddie's steadying hand on her arm and again she was glad he had come.

Mary opened her eyes to the glory of the setting sun. Now was the time to carry out her purpose in coming to the tower. She must turn from that miracle of color in the western sky to the clutter of dull gray threedeckers. On the top of this tower hate of their ugliness had first been born in her; here she would clinch her resolution to leave them forever.

But Eddie was a disturbing factor! Emboldened, he was slipping an arm around her waist. He was speaking, and the word "love" occurred often. She couldn't find it in her heart to rebuke him, for surely his years of devotion deserved one memory. It dimmed the clearness of her vision. Mary felt herself drifting into a great peace and content there, on the top of the world, alone with Eddie. It was an anesthesia from which she must arouse herself, for marrying Eddie would mean staying on the desecrated hill of drab tenement houses. . . .

So Mary turned her eyes toward the east and saw—a reflection of the sunset, all pastel grays and pinks and blues! She saw a thin, nebulous mist enshrouding the hill—and gasped at the sheer beauty of it all. For behind that translucent curtain lay, not a huddle of dingy domiciles, but a cluster of fairy castles of smoked pearl, opalescent and mysterious in their shadowy outline!

Eddie's arm tightened around Mary's waist and somehow Mary's head found the hollow in Eddie's shoulder that had been made for it. And right there, somehow, Mary forgot all about going away. Eddie was saying something about not working in the mill all his life; and something about some day building a little house with a green roof for Mary.

But Mary wasn't really listening—there were already fairy castles, even there, in Threedeckerdom.

How often do we hear someone say, "John Brown has more luck than I have, that is why he gets along," etc., or "Smith was born under a lucky star, he cannot help but succeed," and similar remarks.

If you will take the trouble to investigate the business methods of these lucky Joneses, and Smiths, you will find that 99 times out of a hundred it is Pluck and not Luck that has made their business a success.

New Words

The number of new words added each year to the English language is approximately 100, so that if a man begins at the age of ten to acquire new words, by the time he reaches his threescore and ten he'll have about 6,000 extra ones, although what good they'll do him heaven only knows.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

SCHOOL NOTES

Our writers were debating this week whether they should use the past or present tense in the notes. At the time of writing we are very busy preparing the annual event, The Christmas Program. Since the school will shut its doors for the year, on Thursday at 3:55 p. m. and not open until 9.00 a. m. on Tuesday, January 4th of the new year; we cannot speak in the present tense to our readers, because at the time you will have this material to remind you of our work, you must likewise be reminded that we have put our school work aside for a brief time. We hope you will like our program and we wish to thank those who helped us in preparing for it. It marks the end of the first "lap" of our school journey this year. We are always eager for a vacation. Now we have it, so lets enjoy it. Say "Merry Christmas" to every one you meet.

What the new year will bring, none of us do know, but those of us who are able generally always reap great benefits from our efforts especially in school work and other study. But we know the harvest does not always come as soon as we should like to have it come. We cannot "undo" the "done" therefore when the new year comes let us begin, the very first day, with a higher attitude to-ward our work and our school. Boost the school, help it along from day to day so that when you leave it you will be proud of the standing it has with other schools.

The eight grade history class is studying Andrew Jackson. Reports were given by the pupils dealing with his life and his importance in the history of the United States.

The seventh grade geography class is taking up Brazil and Argentine as to their possibility of becoming world powers in the future. We should be interested in these two countries because they offer unlimited resources and it will have to be the American people who will build these up.

The third and fourth grades have been busy making Christmas presents for their younger brothers and sisters. They have made health posters. Every one has received a silver star this week for being clean and neat.

The American history class is now studying President Coolidge's Message to Congress.

The English IV class is studying Chancer's "Prologue" of the Canterbury Tales.

The first and second graders have had their reading "games" this week which in the upper grades would be called "tests."

FUTURE BECKONS YOUNG AMERICANS

Achievements of Past Only Show Great Opportunity Ahead.

Great events of the past quarter century which lead some young men to complain that all the big things have been done, leaving no opportunity for them, as a matter of fact only go to show that even greater opportunity today lies ahead of them, F. N. Shepherd, Executive Manager of the American Bankers Association, recently told members of the American Institute of Banking in New York. After reviewing the outstanding accomplishments in science, industry and finance during the last twenty-five years, Mr. Shepherd emphasized the reward given men of achievement in America, especially in the financial field.

"The achievements of the past are the groundwork for the opportunities of today and tomorrow," he said. "There never was a time when so great were the potentialities of the individual. The world was never so ready and able to pay well for what it wants. For superior service to society under competitive conditions, whether through invention or production or organization or distribution of useful articles, no reward is begrudged, particularly here in America.

"Adding to human comfort and human needs, these things make life finer and better. The world has shared, but it is in America that they have reached their highest development and utilization. The American spirit of useful enterprise, however, does not confine itself within our own borders. It permeates the entire world and renders great service to peoples other than our own.

"Let us pass over America's service to humanity in the war and consider what is being done now. Largely to rebuild the economic life of a world shattered by the war and its devastating after effects, America has, since the war, loaned other peoples over ten billion dollars. Last year alone a billion and a half in foreign financing was consummated in the United States. American financial genius has so far readjusted our banking machinery to meet enlarged international obligations that stupendous foreign loans, such as the $100,000,000 Dawes plan credit to Germany, are concluded and the books closed after being open to public subscription only a few minutes.

"With our new world viewpoints we in America have many great things yet to do. These things are typical of the broadminded world viewpoint of American finance. It shows the vision necessary to the men who guide our business affairs today. Certainly there is an inspiration in this and the great opportunities which await us."

Bankers and business men of the leading towns of Taylor county, Texas, employed a county agent last spring, and requested that he vigorously promote boys' and girls' club activities. As a result of his work over 200 club members were enrolled. Work is being concentrated this year on poultry culling and grain sorghum seed selection. This fall there will be exhibits and contests, for which the business men are contributing generous prizes.

Received Invitation

Paul Engelstad, of Thief River Falls, a director of the Red River Valley Livestock association, received an invitation last week C. G. Selvig of Crookston, the association's president to have Pennington county reconstruct the alfalfa arch at the Winter Shows to be held in Crookston during the week of Feb. 7 to 11.

As the southbound mail now goes half hour earlier, all letters and parcels must be mailed by two o'clock.

From now on it will be impossible to wait on both village and country people between trains, therefore those in and near town should mail their letters and parcels and get their money orders in the forenoon.

The mails will now be so crowded that parcels will travel very slowly until the Christmas rush is over. All parcels should be mailed early enough so that ordinarly they would reach their destination a full week before Christmas. Perhaps then they may get there on time. Mark parcels "Do not open until Christmas." Parcels will not be delivered on Christmas day as all postoffices close at noon.

A little cooperation on the part of the public will greatly help us at this time of the year.

Here's Minnesota's youngest tuberculosis fighter!

Two months' old Mary Ann, aided by the nurses and doctors at Glen Lake Sanatorium, Hopkins, is going to fool Old Man T. B., who has claimed as victims her mother and brother.

Tiny Mary Ann, although deprived of the caresses of her mother, who is making a determined struggle for health in another building, gurgles and coos all day long. The mother comes to the Children's department now and then and gazes with wistful eyes through glass windows at her baby girl, whom she has not been allowed to touch since birth. Sad but wise, this mother makes no complaint, for she knows tuberculosis is contagious and complete separation is the only sure way of protecting her child.

Eighteen years ago Mary Ann's chances for escaping tuberculosis would have been slight, physicians state, but today thanks to the Christmas Seal educational campaign she will be saved. "Buy Christmas Seals—help save other Mary Anns."

RAILWAY STATION IS CARRIED OFF

Handsome Structure in Florida Razed by Negroes.

Jacksonville, Fla.—A complete railway station was carried off at Magnolia Springs, near here, recently.

The station, a large and handsome building, erected as an addition to the Magnolia Springs hotel, which burned down recently, was missing when W. G. Spiker, the owner, went to ascertain if it needed repairs.

First appearances denoted that the station had been burned down, but further investigation showed it had been razed and the material carted off.

Subsequently, Francis Richards, negro, was found with ten wagonloads of lumber in his yard. Another negro had a similar amount. They said a man who gave the name of McConnelly issued orders for the station to be razed. He told them they might have the lumber for their trouble.

Since McConnell represented himself as an employee of the Atlantic Coast line and said he had been ordered by officials of the railroad to raze the building, the negroes proceeded openly with their destructive work, they said.

The Atlantic Coast line officials declare they have no such man in their employ, and have assigned detectives to hunt McConnell.

The missing building was 46 by 25 feet with wings and had many valuable decorative features.

At Last Smokes Cigar Given Him 63 Years Ago

Greenville, Ohio. — T. J. Burns smoked his first cigar on his seventy-seventh birthday.

And as he smoked, memory pictured for him in the fragrant blue haze a scene in a little cross-roads store at Gettysburg, on his fourteenth birthday, when the proprietor presented him with a "ten-center."

In those days, a "ten-center" was considered quite a cigar. Burns decided to keep it "until after supper." After supper he decided to save it until he was older and better able to appreciate it.

And the longer he saved it, the more attached to it he became. He lavished every kindness on it. He wrapped it carefully in cotton, and moistened it now and then to keep it from cracking.

He decided at last to smoke the cigar which had furnished him so much anticipatory cheer during sixty-three years.

"I was afraid I might not be here to smoke it next year," he said. "Oh, yes, I been smokin' all my life, but this was my first cigar. Right good one, too,"

Uncle Sam Preserves Indians' Burial Ground

Yakima, Wash.—Melmaloose island in the Columbia river, burial ground for western Indians for uncounted generations and particularly sacred to the Yakimas, has been set aside by the government as a red man's city of the dead.

Since the days when thousands of Indians from western plains and mountains made annual pilgrimages to the fishing grounds of The Dalles and the "tum-water" of the Columbia, bringing their dead with them, the island has been a holy ground for the aborigines. Formerly it was covered with large "dead houses," built of cedar, on the shelves of which reposed the mummified bodies of the red men.

Sinew-wrapped bows and stone-tipped arrows were deposited with some of the older remains, and more modern weapons with some of the more recent.

Device Trains Shell Directly on Plane

San Pedro, Calif.—A new fire-control instrument for the opeation of antiaircraft guns, recently perfected by the Navy department, has proved "highly satisfactory" in its first service tests made aboard the U. S. S. Maryland, naval experts revealed.

The device, which transmits electrically all firing data to the antiaircraft batteries, is said to direct shellfire with such accuracy that antiaircraft gunners can anticipate the path of a flying plane and by merely setting the fuse of an explosive shell can fire so the shell and plane will meet at a previously calculated point. The instrument, described as having 40,000 working parts, is so designed that since the altitude of the plane is determined, the only action required is for one observer to follow the target's elevation and another its direction. This is done through telescopes mounted on the instrument.

Holds $30 Bill Issued in 1778; Legal Tender

New Britain, Conn.—A bona fide $30 bill is held by Bernard L. Hoppe of this city. Local banking houses pronounce it authentic, and Hoppe has refused many times its face value.

The note, dated September 26, 1778, and signed by "A. Lawrence, Secretary of the United States Treasury," is numbered 217,305. It is about one-fourth the size of a modern dollar bill. Bankers say it is still legal tender.

TURKISH PROGRESS IS BLOW TO CZECHS

Abolition of Fez Hits Important Industry.

Washington.—When news reached the world that Turkey had abolished the fez it created mild interest.

That is, the interest was mild in nearly all the world except in a little Czechoslovakian village in the Bohmer Wald, where it stirred up amazement instead. Now the people of Strakonitz have protested against Turkey's abandonment of its traditional headgear because it cripples their industry of supplying fezzes to Turkey.

"The predicament of Strakonitz (the Czechs spell it Strakonice) affords a telling cross-section of Czechoslovakian industry," says a bulletin from the headquarters of the National Geographic society in Washington.

"Long before Czechoslovakia became an independent state it had the habit of making things for other nations. When the buying power of Europe shrank after the war, Czechoslovakians were forced afar for markets as they never were before. The 'Yankees of Europe,' as they have been called, have been doing business with the 'Yankees' of America. What woman is not familiar with Czechoslovakian glass beads from Gablonz, with Czech embroidery and Bohemian glassware?

"Strakonitz, Gablonz, Kladno, Pribram, Brunn and other manufacturing towns are in the western end of the country. Czechoslovakia, at first, seemed an awkwardly long name, but it helps one remember the geography of the nation. Czech is a short, compact name, and likewise the western, or Czech, or Bohemian section, is as compact as a box. Slovakia stretches out on the tongue and geographically tapers out along the Carpathian range like a scarf trailing behind the Bohemian box.

"The edges of the box are mountain ranges and Strakonitz lies near the south wall. Another way of giving its position is to say that Strakonitz lies half way between Ceske Budejovice and Plzen. A still better way is to say that it lies half way between Budweis and Pilsen, for the German spellings of those towns are far more familiar to an American than the Czech spellings.

Volstead Act Grieved Pilsen.

"The sorrow caused Strakonitz by the Turkish edict against the fez is a drop in the bucket beside the grief Pilsen faced because of the United States' declaration of prohibition. Pilsen's municipal brewery is the largest in Czechoslovakia and one of the largest in the world. Its product goes to nearly every land. This brewery is a community project operated by a few hundred house owners of the town.

"While the textile industries, including the hat making of the Strakonitz district, are extensive, even a slight inquiry into the Czechoslovakian trade reveals that Bohemia is especially dedicated to beverages. First there is Hana (Prossnitz) in Moravia, between Bohemia and Slovakia, famous for its barley malt, which is shipped all over the world. Then there is Saaz (Zatec) in the far west of Bohemia, famous for its hops, which are shipped to Pilsen and to Germany. There also are the numerous breweries. And finally there is the extensive glass industry centered in Gablonz (Jablonec) for fancy ware and Teplitz (Teplice), Prague (Praha), etc., for plainer ware.

"Pilsen, Strakonitz and Budweis are also within the chief health springs district of southern Bohemia, one of the most famous of Europe. In past ages the country was liberally sprinkled with small volcanic peaks. Volcanic activity has survived only in the warm health springs, such as Karlovy Vary, better known as Karlsbad, and Mar Lazne, better known as Marienbad."

Whistling Policeman Is Saved by Whistle

New York.—There was considerable whistling early in the morning in the vicinity of Manhattan avenue and One Hundred and Eighteenth street.

Patrolman Frank A. Ryan of the West One Hundredth street station was making his rounds just before daylight while solemnly contemplating, as is his wont, a weighty metaphysical problem. He was just speculating as to what would have been the fate of Europe had Napoleon not had a cold the night before the battle of Waterloo, when he was interrupted by the sight of three men trying to break into Samuel Lipman's drug store at the intersection of the aforementioned thoroughfares.

"Whew—" whistled Patrolman Ryan to himself.

"Wh-ew," whistled the three men on finding themselves thus rudely interrupted.

"Whoa, there!" shouted Patrolman Ryan, as he saw the men running to their automobile.

The driver swerved his car and bore down on him. He pulled his gun and fired three times. The three returned the salute. A fourth hit him on the hip and felled him.

All of which gave Patrolman Ryan a new problem. For it was his police whistle, silent all through the interchange, that deflected the bullet that whistled straight for his body.

SPANISH TRAIL LURES TOURISTS

Scenic Spots Line Famous Highway in South.

Biloxi, Miss.—Established by the Spanish conquerors almost a century before the Pilgrims landed in New England, the old Spanish trail across the southern borderlands of the United States is now becoming a favored winter tourist route, affording unexcelled scenic effects.

Beautiful at all times from its beginning at St. Augustine, Fla., to its western terminus at San Diego, Calif., the historic trail is in all its foliage at this season of the year. Its year around climate with mild autumn days and cool nights make motor travel a pleasure.

The complete construction of this transcontinental highway is now assured and some $62,000,000 already has been spent. Constant improvement and paving are on the program of state and federal highway officials. Millions likewise are being spent on connecting roads.

The expeditions of the conquistadores in their search for the riches of the western coast are unfolded along the route. From St. Augustine, the oldest city in America, the highway travels across the pine tree barrens of west Florida to Old Mobile.

Biloxi, founded by D'Iberville in 1699 as the first capital of the Louisiana territory, and historic Pass Christian, are points on the trail along the Mississippi Gulf coast.

Following the shore of the gulf of Mexico, the trail leads south to New Orleans the gateway to the South, and westward across the Louisiana bayous to the Texas plains. San Antonio, the cross roads of the Southwest, famous for its missions, including the immortal Alamo, is visited.

Cats Are Responsible for Creeping Eruption

Washington.—Creeping eruption, a common and annoying infection prevalent in the southern states, approaches a solution with a recent discovery at the United States bureau of entomology that dogs and cats are concerned in its causation.

For some time scientists have been searching for the original home of this parasite that attaches itself to man, leaving red, sensitive, raised places and causing intense itching.

Tests made at the United States bureau of entomology implicate dogs and cats. The theory that creeping eruption and hookworm are related was also strengthened in the experiments. It was discovered that larvae from dogs and cats, producing creeping eruption when applied experimentally to the human skin, had the general appearance of hookworm larvae. It was further observed that in the dogs and cats were adult hookworms of the same genus as the hookworm which affects man.

Helium May Reveal Sea's Buried Secrets

Washington.—More secrets of the sea may be revealed in the future than in the past, through a discovery for the use of helium in deep-sea diving. Experiments are being conducted by the bureau of mines along lines already followed in laboratory and practical tests.

Helium was used in salvaging the hull of the submarine 8-51, near Newport, R. I., and during an inspection of the Lakeland, a Cleveland ship which was sunk several years ago in Lake Michigan.

The extent of helium's importance in undersea exploration depends upon investigation now being conducted at Pittsburgh and Norfolk.

Helium promises to extend greatly both time and depths of underwater opration by divers and thus enlarge the whole range of submarine engineering.

Naval Observatory Stops Giving Time Over Phone

Washington.—The naval observatory, which corrects the nation's timepieces twice daily through its accommodations to various telegraph and wireless services, announces discontinuance of telling the time to individuals over the telephone. Since the Western Union company discontinued giving the time by telephone, it was explained, the number of calls to the observatory has increased from 650 to 2,000 daily, overwhelming the observatory's exchange and interfering with the conduct of its work.

3,000 at Service Vow They Talk With Dead

London.—An impressive belief in spiritualism was registered at the spiritualists' annual armistice service in Albert hall. Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, leading the services, suddenly appealed to his hearers, shouting:

"I ask all who are sure that they have been in touch with their dead to rise and testify."

More than 3,000 men and women of all types quietly rose, and this brought from Sir Arthur this fervent statement:

"Thank God there are so many. I prophesy within five years that to such an appeal every man and woman will rise. We are not testifying to faith but to fact."

THE BLIND MAN

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman.)

I.

THE lonely blind man came slowly along the passage of his big house, thumping his cane. At the door of the parlor he stopped, hearing voices.

The voices ceased. A charming woman came forward and gave the blind man her arm.

"Are you coming in to tea, dear?" she asked.

Charles Hawley, the blind man, gripped her arm tightly. "Who is with you?" he asked.

"Only Lionel," answered his wife.

"I don't think—yes, I'll come in and see Lionel," said the blind man.

Lionel Graves had been Hawley's best man at his wedding eight years before. Both were prosperous architects, members of the same firm. Then Hawley had suddenly gone blind. The attack came on him without any warning as he sat at his desk one day. By the time he reached home he lived in a world of darkness.

There was no organic trouble that the specialists could discover. His light had simply gone out. They pronounced it to be atrophy of the optic nerves, and incurable.

Charles Hawley gave up his work and withdrew into the seclusion of his home. He had plenty of money, he had a charming wife, but the light was gone out of his life as well as out of his eyes. His little daughter, their only child, had died the year before. Life now seemed utterly purposeless.

At first he thought that he would break down under the strain. He grew nervous and despondent. He hired a man to read to him and accompany him abroad, and then he blamed Letty for allowing the care of him to fall into the hands of the attendant. In his increasing suspicion he believed that his wife found him a nuisance. He suspected her of caring for Lionel, his best friend.

As the blind man's eyes closed, his ears opened. He heard every sound in the house, conversations on other flights; he fancied that Lionel was constantly there unknown to him. Gradually his wife and he became estranged. Letty was too proud to question him and withdrew into herself also.

So matters went on for several years. They hardly met now, and Letty's rare approaches were received by Charles with coldness.

II.

"I believe you can be cured."

Doctor Abergavenny, the specialist, put down the flash mirror and spoke.

"The trouble is," said Abergavenny, "the optic nerve has ceased to function. But it is intact. There is no atrophy. I think the whole question revolves itself into a case of stimulating it. A few electrical treatments should restore the tone. Then, if your sight returns, it will return completely. I had such a case last month and the treatment proved a success."

"When shall I come to you for treatment?" inquired Hawley.

"I can come to your house."

"No, I prefer to come to you," said Hawley.

"Then let us begin right away," the doctor answered.

After an hour's treatment the blind man was as hopelessly blind as before. He returned daily and the treatments had no result whatever. He grew discouraged.

"When the sight returns it will come like a flash," said the specialist. "I can see an improvement. You may suddenly see—"

"Or I may never see?"

The oculist admitted that. "There is no use continuing the applications," he said. "If the sight does not come back you might try another course in six months' time. But, frankly, I don't understand why your sight has not come back of its own accord."

Hawley knew that the specialist tacitly admitted failure. He paid him five hundred dollars and went home. And now he began to pray for the gift of sight.

He wanted to look for one moment upon his wife's face when she was with Lionel Graves. For that privilege he felt that he would give ten years of his life. Either he had bitterly wronged her or he was deeply wronged.

Lionel continued to be their visitor. He and Letty were alone a great deal. Hawley did not know how much. Sometimes he fancied that he passed a waiting figure in the hall, or on the stairs. He read guilt into his wife's voice, he wondered where she went when she was out of the house. He grew more and more irritable, and at last dismissed his attendant, declining his wife's offers of assistance. He was completely cut off from the world. He lived like a hermit in an upper room of his big house.

III.

Charles Hawley saw!

He awoke one morning to discover that vision had come back to him completely. He sprang out of bed and ran to the mirror. He looked with amazement upon the gaunt, haggard man, with lined face and graying hairs who stared at him out of the mirror.

His first impulse of joy was to tell his wife. His second was to restrain that motive. He felt that at last his chance had come.

He made his way downstairs, tapping with his cane as usual. He saw his wife for the first time in years. He noticed that she, too, seemed to have aged.

"Dear, I am thinking of going out for the afternoon," she said to him.

He nodded as if he did not see her, though his eyes scanned her face.

"I have some shopping that must be done," she continued. "Is there anything I can do for you?"

"Nothing," he answered.

From his window upstairs he watched her leave the house after luncheon. As soon as she was in the street he slipped on his overcoat and put on his hat. He followed her. Ashamed and yet determined to probe her acts, he dogged her footsteps on the opposite side of the street.

She hired a taxicab and he took another, ordering it to drive in pursuit. As he had suspected, it stopped at Graves' house. Letty went in.

Charley Hawley waited in the door of a big apartment house opposite. He never took his eyes from the door till Letty and Graves came out.

They walked for blocks, and always the man who had been blind followed them.

They were approaching a suburban district and it was beginning to grow cloudy. Hawley wondered why they still walked on together.

They turned into a little yard that led toward a church. On one side was the building, on the other the graveyard. It was an old parish church which had stood there for nearly a hundred years—since the days when the metropolis was only a distant blur on the sky line, and this an independent village.

Hawley remembered what was familiar about this church. He had been married here. And—their child had been buried here. It was only a few years before, but the time that had passed since then seemed infinite.

They were approaching the grave of the child. Hawley clenched his fists. Anywhere but there, he thought. If they had gone anywhere but there.

They were so absorbed in their conversation that they did not hear him approaching; nor might they have recognized him in the shabby, muffled man who glided into the doorway behind them.

Hawley's sharp ears could now hear their conversation.

"She was all that united us," Letty was saying.

"It was good of you to bring me here. I appreciate your confidence and understand how much it means to you," said Lionel.

"If only Charles could understand what he means to me. I have tried so hard to regain his love, and it means nothing at all to him. While our little girl lived he cared for me; but since she died and he has become blind he cares for no one. And I would give my whole heart to comfort him."

"Yes," said Lionel. "I don't know what can be done—except to wait and hope."

"I ought not to have told you this," went on Letty. "I should never have told anyone but you, and that only because you are his only friend."

"Was," said the other. "I have felt that I hold that friendship no longer."

Letty turned her eyes on him; and suddenly Hawley, with bursting heart, realized that neither of them understood the suspicions that had been in his heart. He had been blind—blind, not only with his physical but with his moral faculties.

He stepped out from the porch. They turned and stood amazed at his appearance. Charles drew his wife to his heart.

Green First Favored for American Flag

The United States flag narrowly missed being a banner of green bearing some sort of a symbolic design, instead of the Stars and Stripes, wrought in red, white and blue. Several green flags made their appearance after the break with England, one of the most striking being a banner carrying a union of white with a circle of 13 links of an endless chain, with an outer circle of 13 mailed fists, emerging from clouds and grasping the 13 links. In the center of the links was a green pine tree on a blue field. It was carried by a Newburyport (Mass.) company.

Green also was the color of the Pine Tree flag and the so-called Liberty Tree flag. Massachusetts, in 1776, prescribed green and white as the uniform of its sea officers, and the marine committee of the Continental congress, in Philadelphia, in the same year, decided upon a green coat, with waistcoat and breeches edged with green for officers of the new American navy, relates the Philadelphia Public Ledger.

The Culpepper minute men, of Virginia, wore green hunting shirts and the Georgia rangers carried a banner of green and white stripes, but despite this sentiment in favor of green, the Continental congress, June 14, 1777, adopted the colors red, white and blue, and those have been retained since.

Chinese "Venice"

Soochow, China, has been called the Venice of the East because of the many canals with which it is intersected. There are 12 canals, which cross each other every quarter of a mile, and these in turn are connected with the outlying country by smaller canals. The Grand canal, on which Soochow is built, is said to be the longest artificial waterway in the world. It is nearly a thousand miles in length and runs from Hangchow to Tientsin. It is considered one of the greatest works of engineering on earth.

If Back Hurts Begin on Salts

Flush Your Kidneys Occasionally by Drinking Quarts of Good Water

No man or woman can make a mistake by flushing the kidneys occasionally, says a well-known authority. Too much rich food creates acids which clog the kidney pores so that they sluggishly filter or strain only part of the waste and poisons from the blood. Then you get sick. Rheumatism, headaches, liver trouble, nervousness, constipation, dizziness, sleeplessness, bladder disorders often come from sluggish kidneys.

The moment you feel a dull ache in the kidneys or your back hurts, or if the urine is cloudy, offensive, full of sediment, irregular of passage, or attended by a sensation of scalding, begin to drink soft water in quantities; also get about four ounces of Jad Salts from any reliable pharmacy and take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine.

This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help flush clogged kidneys and stimulate them to activity, also to help neutralize the acids in the system so they no longer cause irritation, thus often relieving bladder disorders.

Jad Salts is inexpensive and cannot injure; makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink, which everyone can take now and then to help keep the kidneys clean and the blood pure, thereby often preventing serious kidney complications.

The Way of a Maid with a Man

by Rafael Sabatini

W.N.U. SERVICE COPYRIGHT

STORY FROM THE START

Cesare Borgia, duke of Valentinois, Italy, is having difficulties with his mercenaries. He has just finished crushing several of his powerful rivals, the job having been completed with the ruthlessness which only he knew how to employ. One of his enemies, however, seems to have escaped, and Cesare is uneasy. This is Matteo Orsini. It is believed that he is in hiding with his recluse kinsman, Almerico, at Pievano. Cesare seeks the right man to find Matteo. Cesare dispatches one of his followers, Pantaleone degli Uberti, with a small troop, to Pievano, to spy out the situation and to capture Orsini. Pretending that he is wounded, Pantaleone gains entrance to Pievano. Almerico and his daughter, Fulvia, affianced to Matteo, welcome Pantaleone, who already feels sure of his success.

Seeing himself scanned with mistrust, he chose that moment to stagger where he stood. He reeled sideways, crashed against a bronze table that stood near him, sent it slithering a yard or so along the marble tiles, and, missing its resistance, he fell heavily beside it and lay at full strtetch upon the floor.

"I am spent," he groaned.

They sprang to him at once—all three: Almerico, his daughter and the groom, who had remained in the background awaiting his dismissal. And whilst her father went down on his old joints to lend immediate aid, Madonna Fulvia issued orders briskly to the gaping lackey.

"Fetch Mario, quickly," she commanded. "Bid them bring wine and vinegar and napkins. Run!"

Pantaleone raised his lolling head and supported it against Almerico's knee. He opened dull eyes, and babbled incoherent excuses for thus discomposing them. This manifestation of concern for them at such a moment touched them profoundly when coupled with his condition; it melted the old Orsini's lingering mistrust as snow upon the hills is melted by the April suns. The man's extremity was dire and obvious—and what could have produced it but the tribulations of which he told?

Came Mario—a short, sturdy fellow with a face that was the color of clay, and so ridged and pitted by smallpox that it seemed no more than a hideous mask, a grotesque simulacrum of a human countenance. He was nominally the castellan of Pievano; in effect, he was many things, a factotum including in his manifold accomplishments the arts of chirurgeon, horseleech, and barber. He was rigidly honest, faithful, self-sufficient, and ignorant.

In his wake now as acolytes came a groom, Monna Fulvia's own woman, and Raffaele the page. Among them they bore flasks and flagons, napkins and a silver basin. With the others they made a group about Ser Pantaleone, whilst Mario went down on one knee beside him and fumbled his pulse, his countenance grave and oracular.

This pulse-feeling was a piece of impressive mummery, no more. For whatever irregularity Mario had discovered there, his prescription would have varied nothing. Finding no irregularity whatever, it still varied nothing.

"Exhaustion. Ha!" he diagnosed. "A little bloodletting will revive him. I'll ease him of some six ounces, and all will be well." He rose. "Vincenzo, lend a hand, and we'll carry him to bed. You, Raffaele, light the way for us."

So Mario and the groom lifted up our gentleman between them. The page took up one of the gilt candlesticks that stood taller than himself upon the floor, and went ahead. The rear was brought up by Virginia, the waiting-maid, and thus in some sort of state was Messer Pataleone degli Uberti carried to bed and established at Pievano.

CHAPTER III

Pantaleone awaking refreshed upon the morrow, found his room suffused with the pale sunshine of a January morning and fragrant with the subtle, refreshing perfume of lemon verbena steeped in potent vinegar; he found it occupied by the page Raffaele, a graceful stripling with a lovely, impudent face and smooth hair that was the color of buttercups.

"For lack of a man to serve you they have sent me," the page explained himself.

Pantaleone considered the supple figure in its suit of green that fitted it like a skin.

"And what are you?" he wondered. "A lizard?"

"I am glad to see you are mending," said the boy. "Impudence, they tell me, is a sign of health."

"And they tell it you often, I've no doubt, and find you healthy in excess," said Pantaleone, smiling grimly.

"Gesu!" said the boy, with uplifted eyes. "I'll bear news of your complete recovery to my lord."

"Stay," Pantaleone bade him, desiring to have a certain matter explained. "Since you were sent to serve, give me first to eat. There is a bowl yonder, steaming. Let it be employed in the service for which it was designed."

Raffaele fetched the bowl which contained a measure of broth, and with it a platter bearing a small wheaten loaf. He also fetched a silver basin with water and a napkin. But these Pantaleone waved impatiently away. He had been reared in camps, not courts, and was out of sympathy with the affectations of mincing fellows who carry washing to excess.

He drank a portion of the soup noisily, broke bread and munched it, considered the page gravely, and set out upon his quest of information which he conceived was to be gathered.

"For lack of men they sent you to me," he said, pondering. "How come they to lack men at Pievano? The Lord Almerico is a great and potent lord, such as should not want for lackeys. Whence then, this lack of men?"

The boy perched himself upon the bed. "Whence are you, Messer Pantaleone?" he inquired.

"I? I am from Perugia," said the condottiero.

"And is it not known in Perugia that the Lord Almerico is above all things a man of peace—of peace and books? He is more concerned with Seneca than with any tyrant in Italy."

With whom?" asked Pantaleone.

"With Seneca," the boy repeated.

"Who is he?" quoth Pantaleone, staring.

"A philosopher," said Raffaele. "My lord loves all philosophers."

"Then he will love me," said Pantaleone, and drank the remainder of his broth. "But you haven't answered my question."

"I have, indeed. I conveyed to you that my lord keeps here no such family as might be expected in one of his estate. There are but four grooms in his service. Vincenzo who helped to carry you to bed is my lord's own servant; Giannone has his duties in the stables, and Andrea has gone down to the borgo on an errand for Madonna."

"That makes but three, and you said there were four."

"The fourth is Giuberti; but then Giuberti has vanished; he disappeared a week ago."

Pantaleone looked at the ceiling dreamily, reflecting how the vanishing of this Giuberti chanced to coincide with the vanishing of Matteo Orsini and wondering whether a link existed that would connect the two.

"He was dismissed, you mean?" he grumbled.

"I do not think so. It is a mystery. But he has not been dismissed, for I have been to his room and his garments are all there. Nor did he leave Pievano, unless he went on foot, for there is no horse missing from the stables. On the contrary—and that is another mystery which none can solve for me—on the morning after Giuberti's disappearance I found seven horses in the stables instead of the usual six. I went there to count them that I might discover whether Giuberti had gone away. As I set little faith in wizardry I am not prepared to accept the simple explanation that Giuberti has been changed into a horse. Had it been an ass, now, I could have believed it—for no great metamorphosis would have been needed. But there it is: we have lost a biped and acquired a quadruped. An engaging mystery."

Pantaleone smiled lazily at the boy and encouraged him with flattery to let the stream of his chatter flow more freely.

"By the Host," he approved him, "although you may be no more than a lad you have a man's wit; indeed, more wit than many a man that I have known. You should go far."

Pantaleone's success appears in the offing. He's a clever rogue—but wait. There's a maid to be reckoned with.

Great Animal Painter

Rosa Bonheur was a dressmaker's apprentice. But her father, a French drawing master of Jewish origin, noticing how promising her sketches were, allowed her to give up her trade and to devote herself to the thing she loved. She discovered that painting animals was her gift. When her famous picture, "The Horse Fair," was exhibited she should have received the Legion of Honor, but it was withheld because she was a woman. Later the Empress Eugenie herself drove to the home of the artist to repair the slight. At the very moment when her pictures were bringing fabulous sums she disappeared from the artistic world. For twenty years she spent most of her time giving free lessons to young people of talent. She lived at her estate near Fontainebleau, surrounded by favorite animals.—Mentor Magazine.

The Peace Offering

by ALEC TUPPER

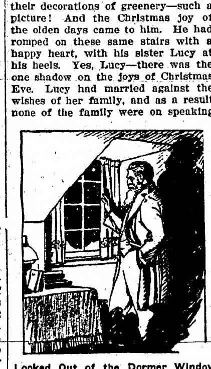
AFTER a continuous fall of snow for over forty hours, the small town of Bethel was covered with a pure white mantle on the day before Christmas.

Over the hills the tinkling sound of sleigh bells was music upon the frosty air of the early winter morning as Judge John Wainwright looked out of the chamber window of his farmhouse. As he peered out of the little panes of glass with their tiny draperies of snow he saw Jasper Jones with his two-hitch plow breaking a way through the narrow Main street of the town, while an occasional salute of "Good mornin', Jasper!" came from neighbors as they shoveled paths from their gateposts.

"Reckon we'll have a real Christmas—snow nearly two feet deep—came down pretty heavy!" remarked Jasper.

The words "a real Christmas," with the sound of sleigh bells, rang all day long in the ears of Judge Wainwright, even after he had finished his supper in company with his wife and son Roland. "Rolley" and his wife, Marion, lived with Judge and Mrs. Wainwright. Marion, being somewhat ill in her room, was unable to join in the evening meal.

After supper Judge Wainwright climbed the handsomely carved old colonial staircase, and when he had reached the seat on the landing he sat for a moment on the red velvet cushion to glance down at the hall with the tall clock ticking merrily and the log fire snapping happily, its rosy glow painting the white walls and their decorations of greenery—such a picture! And the Christmas joy of the olden days came to him. He had romped on these same stairs with a happy heart, with his sister Lucy at his heels. Yes, Lucy—there was the one shadow on the joys of Christmas Eve. Lucy had married against the wishes of her family, and as a result none of the family were on speaking terms with her. Lucy, a widow, feeble, but graceful in her age of seventy-five years, lived in the little cottage on the Wainwright estate, cut off with a very slight income by the will of her father, John Wainwright.



Looked Out of the Dormer Window Upon the Night.

Judge Wainwright went up to his study and looked out of the dormer window upon the night. The sky was clear and a large star shone brightly above the distant hill of pine trees and all the other stars seemed to twinkle happily about it. The loveliness of the landscape charmed him, and, relaxing from any other thoughts, he turned the light very low and lay upon a couch near the window.

When a loud knock upon the door startled him he realized he had fallen asleep and the excited v[illegible]e of Sarah, the colored maid, called to him that "Missus Marion done took very sick."

It was the midnight hour when Judge Wainwright again stood by his study window, and glanced out again into the night. The big star was high and luminous and long beams seemed to stream from it as it hung aloft, over the little town of Bethel. A new joy had come into the judge's heart, for a new-born babe had come into the home. And as he turned from the window he glanced at a pictured motto on the wall, placed there by his own mother. It read: "Blessed Are the Peacemakers, for They Shall Be Called the Children of God." Speedily the bitterness toward poor Lucy which had been in his heart for so many years had departed and the tears came to his eyes. He determined then to make the grandest peace upon the Christmas day. He would call upon Lucy himself, ask for her forgiveness and announce the glad tidings of a son—a most glorious gift bestowed by God in the old Wainwright homestead. It was a day of real Christmas rejoicing, upon which the spirit of the man who said "Peace upon earth" rested and the little town of Bethel had its share in the advent of a new citizen—John Wainwright, III."

The American Santa Claus is a corruption of the Dutch San Nicholas. G. H. McHughes says: "Santa Claus, the name derived from Saint Nicholas through the familiar use of children in Teutonic countries, crossed to America. The direct route followed by him is somewhat open to question. On the way he traded his gray horse for a reindeer and made changes in his appearance."

When She Likes a Man

I have noted, writes Ed Howe, that every woman I know pretty well, wants to take a peck at me; straighten my tie, scratch a spot off my vest, or say I should use something for dandruff. Forest Fires

The figures relating to the forest fires on the middle northern part of the country seem to indicate that while the number of outbreaks has increased, the total damage done is decreased. These figures, declares the forest service, indicate clearly that while progress has been made in fire suppression there is a crying need for better fire prevention, especially as only 1 per cent of fires in the whole ten years were due to lightning, and only 2 per cent were deliberately set.

BANKERS HELP

Minnesota bankers played a constructive part in boosting the attendance at the Northwest Dairy Exposition held in connection with the State Fair in September. Five hundred members of the Minnesota Bankers Association received letters from the chairman of the agricultural committee, asking them to assist in forming delegations from their respective communities to attend the show.

The Atlanta, Ga., Clearing House gives the boll weevil no rest. In an effort to effect a concerted and statewide poison war on the boll weevil, this institution sent letters recently to all the bankers in the state asking that they assist in emphasizing the need for a wholesale war on the pest. According to a recent survey poisoning is being done on the larger farms, but not to any appreciable extent on the small farms. According to reports by the Department of Agriculture, the boll weevil infestation is heavier this year than ever before, and if allowed to go unchallenged the crop will be destroyed. Immediate and extensive action is urged.

Over two hundred bankers in Iowa recently made an arrangement to attend the Iowa State University for a two-day period and study farming and farm problems. The bankers will sit as students under the professors in the agricultural department, and will dig right down to the bottom of the many subjects which are of mutual concern to themselves and the farmers. This action on the part of the bankers of Iowa shows a real spirit of interest and a determined intention to understand.

Clark County (S. D.) Bankers, have appointed an agricultural committee of five to aid the county agent in putting across the latter's program of work, with especial emphasis on a ten-acre corn contest and eradication of tuberculosis in the county.

Merry Christmas!

We wish you all a Merry Christmas.

Minn. Regains Best Butter Title

Once more Minnesota is officially recognized as the 'best butter' state in the Union.

The 1626 silk banner typifying the grand championship of the creamery butter world was awarded to Minnesota recently at the annual convention at Sioux Falls, S. Dak., of the National Creamery Buttermakers' association.

"The winning of the banner symbolizes the fact that Minnesota creamery butter is without peer in the entire world from a quality standpoint.

"Butter buyers from large consuming centers will again turn to Minnesota for butner supplies. It is impossible to estimate the intrinsic value of winning the banner, but it will run into millions of dollars."

WARNING: --"The deep snows which have arrived unusually early, accompanied by severe cold weather, make it necessary that all bird life that winter in this climate, be given food and shelter, or, there will be great danger that they will perish."

STORY FROM THE START

His task of putting down insubordination among his mercenaries being finished, Cesare Borgia, duke of Valentinois, is uneasy over the escape of one of his enemies, Matteo Orsini. Pantaleone is sent by Borgia to search for Matteo. Gaining entrance to the house of Almerico, Matteo's kinsman, Pantaleone pretends to be a wounded enemy of Borgia and wins the welcome of Almerico and his daughter, Fulvia, affianced to Matteo. From what he hears, Pantaleone feels that he is on the track of Matteo.

The boy curled his green legs under him upon the bed, and smiled, well gratified.

"You miss nothing," Pantaleone spurred him on.

"Indeed, not much," the boy agreed. "And I could tell you more. For instance, it happens that Mario's wife has also disappeared. Mario is our castellan—he with the pock-marked face, who bore you to bed last night and bled you. Mario's wife had charge of the kitchen, and she vanished together with Giuberti. Now that is a circumstance that intrigues me greatly."

"It might intrigue you less if you were older," said Pantaleone, implying something which he did not himself believe, and implying it solely as a goad.

Raffaele threw back his head, and considered the soldier with some scorn.

"You said well when you said that I had more wit than many a man," he informed Pantaleone with pointed significance. "A man, of course, would blunder here to a prompt and lewd conclusion. Bah, sir! I am a boy, not a cherub in a fresco. You have but to see Colomba—Mario's wife—to be assured of the chastity of her relations with Giuberti or with any man."

"Precocious ape," said Pantaleone. "Your discourse is a scandal to a poor soldier's ears. I'd have the rods to you if you were boy of mine." He flung back the bedclothes so that the lad was momentarily smothered in them, and rose to dress himself. He had learnt all that Raffael could tell him.

"It is the mystery of it all that intrigues me," babbled the page, unabashed. "Can you solve the riddle, Ser Pantaleone?"

"I'll try," said Pantaleone struggling with his hose, but Raffael for all his precocity missed the grimness of that answer.

Thus, then, you see our adventurer in possession of certain facts that seemed to him tolerably clear: the disappearance of the groom, Giuberti, and of the woman, Colomba, synchronizing with the appearance of an additional horse in the stables and hence, presumably, with the arrival at Pievano of Matteo Orsini, indicated that the care of him had been entrusted to those two servants. Now, since, had Matteo Orsini remained in the castle itself, so much would have been unnecessary, it was further to be inferred that—no doubt for greater secrecy—he had been lodged elsewhere, though doubtless (and the presence of the horse confirmed this) somewhere within the precincts of the citadel.

So far Ser Pantaleone was clear, and already he accounted the half of his task accomplished. His next step must be to ascertain what quarters outside the actual rocca the place contained.

He dressed himself with care in the garments which the page had brought him from the kitchen, where they had been sedulously dried. The pert Raffaele ushered him into the presence of Messer Almerico and Madonna Fulvia. They received him cordially, expressing genuine pleasure at his evident recovery. All hesitation and mistrust apeared to have vanished from the old man's demeanor, whence Ser Pantaleone inferred that meanwhile the lord of Pievano had consulted with Matteo, and that Matteo had told him—since in fact no man could have denied it—that his story was very possibly true, and that he had been friendly with Paolo Orsini as he said. Hence, superfluously now, the circumstance of Matteo's presence was confirmed to him yet again.

Intent upon his task, he would have gone forth at once claiming the need to take the air. But here the clay-faced Mario interposed with all the pompous authority of a medical adviser.

"What, sir? Go forth—in your condition? It were a madness. Last night you had the fever, and you were bled. You must rest and recover, or I will not answer for your life. Forth you do not go save at your peril, at the peril of undoing all the good I have done."

And then to Mario's persuasions were those of Orsini and his daughter, until in the end, seeing that to insist further might be to awaken suspicions dormant now, Ser Pantaleone, chafing inwardly but still laughing outwardly, submitted. He spent the day indoors, and found the time hang heavily, despite the kindly efforts exerted by his host and his host's daughter to lighten it for him.

The kindness which they lavished upon him, the fact that he sat at table and broke bread with them, made no slightest impression upon Ser Pantaleone. The hideous treachery of the thing he did, the vileness of the manner in which he had insinuated himself into their confidence, left him untouched. It was naught to him that he should sit there in Pievano receiving the hospitality that is bestowed upon a friend.

This Pantaleone was a man without sensibilities, an egotist with a brutally practical mind which harbored no considerations but those of worldly advancement. Honor to him was no more than one of the infirmities of vain men. Shame was a sentiment unknown to him. Macchiavelli might have honored him for the fine singleness of purpose by which he was ever guided towards the given end in view.

On the morrow at last he had his way, despite Mario's lingering doubts that it was unwise for him to go abroad. He would have taken the page with him for company, thinking that the chatterbox might be of service to him, but the excessive hospitality of Pievano ordained otherwise. Since he would not be denied his desire to take the air, Madonna Fulvia should be his guide. He protested that it was to do him too much honor—as indeed it was. Nevertheless she insisted, and together they went forth.

The gardens of Pievano ran in a flight of terraces up the steep sides of the hill behind the castle, the whole of it enclosed by massive, gray, machicolated walls that had stood two hundred years and more, and resisted more than one siege in the past—though that was before the days of such artillery as Cesare Borgia now commanded.

They came slowly to the topmost terrace—there were six of them in all, whence a fine view was to be commanded of all that broad valley. Here they found a sheltered spot under the western wall, where a seat hewn out of granite was set before a deep tank sunk to its rim into the ground—one of a series that were used in summer for irrigation purposes.

Ser Pantaleone slipped his great red cloak from his shoulders, and spread it on the seat for his companion. She demurred awhile. Was he wise to sit, was not the air too chill, and was he not perhaps heated from his walk? Thus, shaping her tender solicitude in questions, she warned him. But he reassured her with a buoyant laugh that made a mock of any assumption of weakness in his own condition.

So side by side they sat on that hewn granite seat. So might a pair of lovers have sat; but if she had no thoughts of love for her companion—her devotion being all given to another, as we know—he had still less for her. It was not that he was usually sluggish to dalliance. Those full red lips of his told a different story, as Fra Serafino had observed. But, in the first place, his taste was all for generously hipped, deep-bosomed Hebes, and in the second his thoughts were all concerned with the enucleation of this problem of Matteo Orsini's hiding place.

His bold, black eyes were questing nearer home, raking the disposition of the outbuildings to the left of the rocca, and an odd pavilion on the other side occupying the middle of a quadrangular terrain that was all walled about so as to form, as it were, a hortus inclusus.

He stretched his long, lithe legs, and took a deep breath of the clean mountain air, noisily like a draught that is relished. Then he sighed.

And now it begins to be unfolded—the way of a maid with a man. But Pantaleone is a monstrous clever fellow.

Matter of Choice

Pat was telling Mike with great pride that he was born in the city of Dublin.

"Well," said Mike, "I was born within two miles of the city of Dublin and could have been born in the heart of the city if I had wanted to be."

Li-Po

In the days when the venerable Bede was writing church history in Northumbria, and Charles Martel hammering Saracens at Tours, and Leo the Isaurian smashing images in Byzantium, the intelligent Chinese were writing poetry. And when, just a thousand years later, a selection was made from the still surviving verse of this Tang dynasty (Seventh-Ninth centuries A. D.), even the anthology included nearly fifty thousand poems in nine hundred books (which may teach our sorely tried generation that others have suffered even worse); and of the twenty-three hundred poets there enrolled, the greatest was Li-Po.—F. L. Lucas, in "Authors."

Conscience Pricks Till He Pays for Loot

Canby, Minn.—Some 30 years ago a boy of fifteen or sixteen, shivering in the cold of a Minnesota winter, stepped into the P. A. Larson general store here to warm himself.

When no one was looking he picked up a pair of warm gloves and walked out.

A few days ago this boy, now a man, stopped Larson on the street and confessed the theft, saying his conscience bothered him. A silver dollar is all the merchant charged the man to get right with the world again and be able to sleep nights.

BARRICADED MAN ROUTED BY ARROWS

Indians Help Capture Murderer of Policemen.

Crow Agency, Mont.—Flaming arrows fired from the bows of Crow Indians, from the cover of farm wagons, brought an end to a siege near here after a negro fugitive had barricaded himself in his barn home and killed two officers and wounded another before flames drove him into the open, where he was riddled with bullets.

Ordered by Sheriff Robert Gilmore of Big Horn county to leave the agency because suspicion attached itself to him in connection with recent robberies, Jim Bolden, a forty-year-old negro cobbler, barricaded himself in a barn where he made his home. He shot and killed Gilmore and John McLeod, a special federal officer, and wounded Deputy Sheriff Andy Dornberger before Crow Indian braves fired the structure with burning arrows and drove the man into the open.

A volley from 300 guns fired by Indians, officers and residents of the agency riddled Bolden's body as he fled from the blazing barn.

The negro was not dead when enraged members of the attacking forces reached him. A score of hands seized him and tossed him into the flames of his home to be cremated.

Virginia Farmer Killed for Not Apologizing

Norfolk, Va.—Goldie L. Curling, forty-five years old, a prosperous farmer of Norfolk county, was warned a month ago to make an apology to a certain person. He paid no attention to the warning. His body was found on a lonely road near Providence church, not a great distance from his home. There were two bullet wounds in his head and one in an arm. The body also showed evidence of having been hacked with knives. No arrests have been made, but developments are expected soon.

Curling left his home in his automobile. When he did not return late at night relatives started a search for him. His brother, Clayton Curling, found the body in the road. The auto was found some distance from the body. There were three knives in the car and the steering wheel was missing. Curling's gold watch was gone, but about $15 was found in his clothing.

Mrs. Curling said that about a month ago her husband had been warned by two men to apologize to a certain person. He contended he did not owe an apology to anybody and paid no attention to the warning. He was threatened with death within 30 days.

George Meade, who lives near where the body was found, said he heard five pistol shots early at night, but paid no attention to them because gunshots on the highways of Norfolk county are frequent.

Curling incurred some enmity by taking sides with a young man accused of a crime which was tried in the county courts some time ago.

Teacher and Snakes Try Porters' Mettle

State College, Pa.—There is no scrimmage of Pullman porters when Prof. George R. Green, head of the nature study department of Pennsylvania State college, appears on the train platform with his luggage.

They know the professor's bags contain snakes, lizards, snapping turtles and horned toads as well as shirts and socks, and they steer a wide course when they see him coming.

Professor Green makes weekly trips to Wilkesbarre, Scranton, Westchester and Philadelphia to meet the 350 or more school teachers taking his course in nature study.

The big test came recently when Professor Green left for Cleveland with a suitcase containing a rattler, blacksnake, green, pilot back, coach whip, pine, copperhead, milk, ribbon and fox snakes.

They Can Come Back

New York.—They can come back. W. W. Sharp, stock broker, was a member of a firm which failed in 1903 for $6,000,000. His will now makes specific legacies of $600,000 without disclosing the value of the estate.

Let 'Em Pet

Washington.—Complaints against "petting" parties on top of the double-deck busses here were given the cold shoulder by the public utilities commission. One member said: "Let them spoon if they want to."

The Pine Tree and a Christmas Inspiration

THE creaking, crunching snow under foot, as well as the crisp, frosty air bespoke a temperature some degrees below zero. However, native mid-westerners looked for, anticipated and expected a quantity of snow and cold weather for the Christmas holidays. Their expectations were usually right with an added cold stretch long before the holidays, and long after them.

The hard lines of the massive, bulky, stone Central Administration building of the college was delightfully contrasted against the dead white, fluffy, fairy-like snow all about it. This building, as did four others, faced a huge stretch of campus, with groupings of trees scattered pleasingly about to break the wide expanse. Trees, heavily hung with the almost artificial-looking cottony webbing formed an artistic group across the road and in front of the building. In the center of the group stood a well formed, tall, perfect specimen of a long-needled pine. It was singled out to be the proud possessor of many colored lights distributed about generously among its branches. Deserving of praise was this awesome tree, and its surroundings.

Silhouetted against the sky, forming a background for the proud pine tree stood the campanile, the pride of every student on the campus. In the dull afterglow of the winter twilight the chimes were extolling the Christmas carols.

At the foot of the narrow winding staircase of iron which leads to the belfry of the campanile, upon close inspection could be seen a maid and young man—not the first time, nor would it be the last time the campanile should witness such a sight. The meeting had been planned in view of their separation on the morrow when both would go to their homes. Moved by the sight of the proud pine, its symbolism, and the chimes, they bade each other farewell in fond embrace, carrying away with them the spirit of the proud pine tree in their hearts.—Eleanor E. King.

THE CHRISTMAS SEASON

HAPPY fatigue. Rushing, hurrying, sitting up late. Doing up bundles. Posting packages. Delivering presents. Getting so tired-out you don't know how you can ever finish and then a new vigor and energy and Christmas spirit coming over you so that you feel you can continue more than ever. Wondering whether it will snow and the snow arriving just in time for Christmas, the stars twinkling down on the white, white earth. Bright red apples with the real flavor of the country. Memories of other Christmases and New Year's, blurred at other times somewhat, but poignantly vivid in the happiness of Christmas-tide. This is the Christmas season.—Mary Graham Bonner.

Making Others Happy Will Bring Happiness

AUNT ELIZA had lived alone for many years; her finances had dwindled, and her health as well.

It was Christmas Eve and as Aunt Eliza returned from town with a few little things that her scant purse could buy, her heart was a little heavy, for the winter was before her and her strength was failing fast.

"I'm glad I got that knife for crippled Jim; he so enjoys cutting out those animals. Life is worth while so long as we can give others pleasure, and there is always some one that we can help. I'll read to blind Jane tomorrow and that will help her and me pass away the day. Tonight I must try to think of some way that I can earn money. Sister would help me if she knew, so would the church ladies, but I simply can't tell anyone. Well, the only way to be happy is to make some one else happy, so I'll take Jimmy's knife to him. God has never forsaken me." All this was going through Aunt Eliza's mind.

As she opened the door she stood face to face with her only sister. She was overcome with joy.

"Oh, Eliza, all the children want for Christmas is you, and they sent me for you. We have a nice home next to ours, for you. We will start tonight so we can get there for dinner tomorrow. You shall never feel lonely again."

Eliza continues to believe that making others happy brings happiness.—Emily Burks Adams.

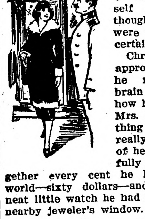
THE YULETIDE HERO

BY MARION R. REAGAN

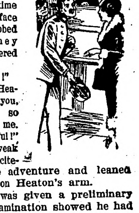
SAM HEATON decided it was high time he did something—something big. Here he was on the far side of forty, no money, no social position—for chauffeurs were little more than servants, he thought—and no wife or family. He was even in more desperate straits. He was enamoured of the young widow, a woman about thirty-six, for whom he was working. He was alternately taken with fits of despair and hope about Mrs. Allan. More frequently it was despair, however, for he couldn't imagine anyone so charming and so rich as Mrs. Allan caring anything for him. But there were times when she smiled at him with special graciousness and talked to him for a longer time than was actually necessary for the transaction of the business in hand, and his hopes rose. After all! many women had married their chauffeurs. He was not bad looking. In fact he had always had a reputation for being something of a Beau Brummel. He comforted himself with the thought that there were worse men, certainly.



Christmas was approaching and he racked his brain to know how he could buy Mrs. Allan something that would really be worthy of her. He carefully gathered together every cent he had in the world—sixty dollars—and bought a neat little watch he had noticed in a nearby jeweler's window.

Christmas Eve he called at the jeweler's for his purchase, put the little package safely in his pocket, and started off into the crowded street. At the corner some one was making a speech. There was an enormous number of people gathered, and it was difficult to pass. Finally Heaton reached the other side of the street, and continued his walk. He put his hand into his pocket to warm it a little and was shocked to find—could it be possible?—the little package—gone! Wildly he ran back through the crowd, looking on the street for it and asking people if they had seen it. Of course it was all useless. It was merely the usual case of the Christmas time pickpocket. He was insanely angry. He must have it. It meant everything to him. Ordinarily the most honest man in the world, he was completely overcome with the desire to get back—in any way—the equivalent of what he had lost. Someone had robbed him; he would rob somebody else.

A little ahead of him he saw a well-dressed woman, her arms full of packages. Without thinking, he went straight towards her, to slip one of them. Simultaneously another man was seized with the same idea. Their hands met. The woman turned sharply. The other man had the package in his hand. Heaton struck him in the face and a fight followed, a fight in which Heaton pursued, the other trying to flee. The woman, panicky, was screaming for the police. Soon several policeman appeared and the man was caught. Heaton forgot that he, too, had been trying to rob the woman. To everyone, even to himself, his case was clearly that of the righteous man pursuing the evil.



At the police station, Heaton for the first time came face to face with the robbed woman. They both registered surprise.

"Mrs. Allan!"

"Oh, Mr. Heaton, it was you, then, who so nobly helped me. I'm so grateful!" She was weak from the excitement of the adventure and leaned comfortably on Heaton's arm.

The thief was given a preliminary hearing. Examination showed he had a whole pocketful of articles he had taken in the crowd. Among the things found was the little watch Heaton had bought for Mrs. Allan.

"I shall have the jeweler who sold me that prove it is mine," said Heaton when he saw it, "or rather yours," he added, turning to Mrs. Allan. "It was to have been your Christmas gift."

"Oh, how wonderful of you," exclaimed Mrs. Allan, her eyes showing clearly how much she thought of the gift, and more of the giver.

They say the gossips talked quite a little when some weeks later they learned that Mrs. Allan had married her chauffeur. But they say, too, that the couple were so completely happy they didn't mind the talking a bit.

GIFTS AT CHRISTMAS

GIFTS at Christmas time were common in medieval times. Accounts tell of the chandlers' guild sending out gratis to every one a special sort of candles which were burned with the Yule log to light the houses for the coming of a supernatural visitor. Bakers also sent out "Yule cakes." Gradually the sentiment of "Peace on earth, good will to men" and the celebration of the spirit by general gifts seems to have spread through the other guilds, and finally to have become general.

SEA UNLIMITED SOURCE OF POWER

Possibilities of Using It Described in Paris.

Paris.—The sea is an unlimited source of motor power, which can be obtained at a minimum cost, Prof. Georges Claude, one of France's leading natural scientists, told the Academy of Science. Professor Claude, who is the inventor of synthetic ammonia, exhibited a generator which he had constructed to get power from the sea.

The method on which Professor Claude and his associate, Professor Boucherot, are at work involves the utilization of the difference in temperature existing between the always lukewarm surface waters of tropic seas and the deeper waters, which are always kept very cold by intensive currents coming from the polar regions.

The natural scientist showed that steam emanating from the process of boiling surface water, although its pressure was only .03 atmospheres, could feed steam turbines when it was sucked up by a vacuum which the colder water from the depths of the ocean could maintain in the condenser. He claims that the power derived from the surface water would equal that which water falling 100 meters could produce and that such power could be derived from the sea in unlimited quantities at the rate of 400,000 kilowatts for each 1,000 cubic meters of hot or cold water per second.

The installation of turbines to generate this power would not, Professor Claude asserted, cost more than the installation of those generating from even the most favored waterfalls in the world and would by virtue of torrents of icy water brought from the depths create a cooling force with which effectively to combat the stifling heat and intense humidity of tropical regions. He hoped that the discovery could soon be put to use for the development of France's tropical colonies.

Bobbed-Haired Bandit Cured by Five-Year Term

Birmingham, Ala.—Gladys Hopper, Alabama's only bobbed-haired bandit, has been granted a parole from state prison by Gov. W. W. Brandon, after she has served since March 13, 1920.

She was given ten years in the state penitentiary of Alabama after pleading guilty to sticking up M. F. Jones and Lee Rasch on a dark street in Florence, Ala., and relieving both men of their watches and a few dollars in cash.

Miss Hopper is a remarkably pretty girl, about twenty years of age. Under Alabama law highway robbery may be punishable by death, life imprisonment or a less number of years in the state penitentiary. It was claimed at the time of this young woman's trial that her beauty influenced the verdict of the jury, hence she received but ten years.

"This was my first attempt at highway robbery and it will be my last," said this fascinating young miss. "It is as easy as falling off a log, however, to take a gun and go out and hold one or two men up and roll them. But over five years in the Alabama state penitentiary is enough for me. It cured me of the desire to go out and make men stick 'em up. I expect to get me a job at honest work and go straight the rest of my life. Reading cheap detective stories was the cause of my downfall."

It Worked

San Antonio, Texas.—The latest wrinkle in jury service evasion worked like a charm in a case here. "What's your profession?" one of the attorneys asked a talesman. "I'm a bootlegger." "Dismissed," ruled the judge.

Heiress Goes to Work

Philadelphia.—Miss Elinor Dorrance, eighteen-year-old heiress, is punching the time clock at 8:30 a. m. for her father's company, which makes soups. Tired of social life, she wants a business career.

New Gold Remedy for Tuberculosis

London.—Preliminary announcements of a new gold treatment for tuberculosis have reached this country from Berlin.

Prof. Erich Leschke of the medical faculty of the University of Berlin, has been working with a new gold compound called triphal, according to the German correspondent of the medical journal Lancet. Injections of one-quarter of a grain of the new compound are administered every four days to patients in various stages of the disease, and it has also been used before performing the operation known as pneumothorax, when there is a cavity in one lung and lesions in the other. Pneumothorax is a process whereby one lung is collapsed to give the tubercular lesions a chance to heal.

The results so far are encouraging, according to Professor Leschke, but he is unwilling to give out more information or make further statements until the remedy has been more completely tested.

DANCING GIRLS BACK ON JOB FOR RULER

Play Prominent Role in India's Courts.

Washington, D. C.—"That dancing girls play a prominent role in the courts of many rulers of India's native states, is indicated by recent reports from Jubbulpore, where Maharajah Zarawal agreed to increase the pay of his court dancers, thus ending a six months' strike and relieving him of embarrassment by the failure of these entertainers to perform at state ceremonies," says a bulletin from the Washington (D. C.) headquarters of the National Geographic society.

"Maharajah Zarawal is one of the scores of Indian princes who are real potentates in their native states, ruling with free hand except in cases of punishment for murder, which usually require confirmation by the British authorities. Fifteen of these states are included in the central provinces where Jubbulpore is located, therefore there are fifteen native potentates and fifteen royal courts.

Important Commercial Center.

"Commercially, Jubbulpore is one of the important inland cities of India," continues the bulletin. "The Great Indian Peninsula and East Indian railways meet here, linking the two largest cities of the Empire—Bombay, 616 miles to the southwest and Calcutta, 780 miles almost due east. Branch lines of these railways, narrow-gauge railroads, and numerous trade routes radiate from Jubbulpore, causing a continuous flow of produce from the outlying districts into the city for local consumption, milling, and shipment to the coast for export to foreign markets.

"Wheat fields along these roads are unique. During the rainy season, the wheat-growing regions resemble a series of shallow lakes. Banks are built around the fields to retain the water which is not released until two weeks before the grain is sown. By this method the farmer has no weeds to fight; the cost of cultivating is decreased; and the success of the crops is not in danger of a drought, since the ground holds sufficient moisture.

"Jubbulpore is a well laid out city with broad streets and numerous municipal gardens. Although it lies slightly farther north of the equator than Tampico, Mexico, the cool climate makes it one of the most desirable cities in the central provinces, due to the fact that it is more than 1,300 feet above sea level.

"The Indian city is the second largest in the provinces, with a population slightly less than Canton, Ohio. This includes the British and native soldiers garrisoned there in a large cantonment; for Jubbulpore is the headquarters of government military forces in this district.

"Most of the working class of Jubbulpore's inhabitants are employed in spinning, weaving, and flour mills, and the shops of the Great Indian Peninsula railway. Others are occupied in local handicrafts, such as brass-working, stone-cutting, and the manufacture of images and ornaments of marble and agate. The prisoners in the provincial jail in Jubbulpore weave cloth and Scotch and Kidderminster carpets for sale.

Thugs Once Confined There.

"The Thugs, a religious band of assassins, and their descendants were confined in Jubbulpore, after they had terrorized all India for more than 700 years. They worshipped Kali, the Hindu goddess of destruction, and murder for gain was a religious duty. They won the confidence of the well-to-do wayfarer and sometimes accompanied or followed their intended victim hundreds of miles for the best opportunity to strangle him to death with a handkerchief. Then the murderer would perform rites in honor of the Thug deity, and set aside a portion of the spoils for her. Owing to the religious garb in which the Thugs shrouded their activities and their thorough secret organization, the Hindu and Mohammedan rulers of India were unable to suppress them. But the British finally suceeded, by a well-organized campaign, in rounding them up and unmasking their system."

Jobless Saxons Making Flowers for Americans

Berlin, Germany—The manufacture of artificial flowers and fruits for export to the United States is providing employment for about 12,000 men and women in Saxony. Otherwise they would be jobless, because of the slump in the textile and fur industry in which most of them were employed.

In Sebnitz alone there are 125 flower manufacturing concerns employing from 200 to 300 workers. In the last year the value of flowers and fruits exported has jumped from $2,500,000 to nearly $4,000,000.

Kills Deer With Arrow as Rifleman Gets No Game

St. Cloud, Minn.—Hunting before white men came with gunpowder to dominate was recalled here when H. C. Picket, a Pemberton merchant, exhibited a deer he killed with his bow and arrow. Picket, a hunter and woodsman for 25 years, used a six-foot bow to bring down the animal, a 175-pound buck. His fourth arrow nearly penetrated the deer's body. Paradoxically, Picket's hunting companion, armed with a modern high-powered game rifle, failed to get a deer.

DISCOVER TRIBE LOST 1,000 YEARS

Expedition in Russia Comes Upon Strange People.

Moscow.—A tribe of people thought to have been extinct for more than a thousand years has been discovered in the Russian Far North.

Living in districts unexplored and largely impenetrable the 15,000 members of the tribe preserve the modes and customs of the time of Charlemagne.

While the outside world moved ahead with lightning rapidity these people have remained just as they were when Europe was in the dark Middle ages.

An expedition sent out by the Academy of Science came upon these northern people. Scientists had believed the tribe perished five hundred years before America was discovered.

The people speak a language near to that of western Finnish peoples. Their religious ceremonies have tendencies of idol worship, but with traces of Christianity which must have been taught by early missionaries.

Each tribe has its own coat of arms and its chieftain like the noblemen of Europe of medieval times. These chieftains live as feudal lords and never heard of Communism or of Karl Marx.

Much material was collected by the academy expedition showing the life and manners of the tribe that dropped out of sight so long ago.

Poorhouse Inmates Paid $750 a Year

London.—Britain's most luxurious almshouse has two vacancies. The almshouse is Morden college, Blackheath, and each resident is provided with a self-contained flat of two furnished rooms and a small kitchen; free light, coal and attendance, free medical treatment; $750 a year and $50 extra for laundry.

There are beautiful gardens, bowling green, billiard rooms, library, recreation room and dining hall. The old men inmates are subject to little or no discipline, wear no badge or uniform to advertise their position, and can stay out as late as they like, and may even stay away for weeks at a time without losing their pay.

They must be old merchants, manufacturers or traders, who, through no fault of their own, have fallen on evil days. Morden college has room for 40 unsuccessful merchants, and as the present average age is seventy-six, changes are fairly frequent.

Morden college was founded by Sir John Morden, a prosperous London silk merchant of the Seventeenth century. When three of his ships were reported missing, he considered himself ruined, and sought service as a clerk with another merchant. He vowed that if fortune returned to him he would make provision for aged merchants who had fallen on evil days by losing ships at sea.

One day he heard that his three long-lost ships had arrived in the Thames, richly laden with eastern merchandise, and found himself a rich man once more, able to carry out his vow.

Count Insects on Trees By Sticky Paper Traps

Washington, D. C.—Screened boxes of sticky fly paper help United States bureau of entomology experts tell how many bugs are parked on a fruit tree. Counting the individual insects that constitute crop pests give entomologists valuable data on the degree of infestation in different orchards and the time of the year when the pest is most numerous.

The box is held under the branches with one hand while they are shaken against it with the other. When a tree is finished, the lid of the box is closed and the insects are counted in the laboratory.

The device has been in use two seasons in studies on insects that attack orange and lemon trees, and has proved of great value in determining the varying degrees of pest occurrence, according to E. A. McGregor of the bureau of entomology.

Army More Religious Than Civilians, Claim

Washington.—The army is more religious than the rest of the country, according to the army chaplains.

Figures presented by Chief Chaplain John T. Axton in his annual report showed a total attendance of more than 1,800,000 at army religious services during the year, or an average of 13 times for every soldier. Though statistics for the entire country are not available, this average is believed much higher than for civilian church attendance.

Denmark Bans Poker; Players Cry "Misdeal!"

Copenhagen.—Danish poker players are not at all satisfied with the Supreme court's decree today, outlawing stud, as well as draw, poker. They contend that their case was lost on a technicality, and that they, therefore, are entitled to another deal, or rather, hearing. The court held that poker was unlawful, as it came within the meaning of the prohibiting gambling clause of the penal code.

THROUGH A WOMAN'S EYES

By JEAN NEWTON

(©, by the Bell Syndicate, Inc.)

A Woman's Failing

"Is there anything in the world more irritating than the way some women make rules to govern everything and then want to run other lives by their own rules and measures and judge other people with the yardstick of their own making? Without knowing or considering the circumstances of a situation or the character and disposition of the person involved, they will fling down their rule for any matter as unquestionably as nature flings a flash of lightning across the sky. With no thought of the responsibility they assume they will volunteer an opinion and give advice on a subject of which they have absolutely no understanding, but which they jam into line under one of their rules! It is the older generation, of course, from whom we suffer most in this way. Is there any wonder, then, that grown children do not seek or regard the advice of their elders who would judge only by the antiquated rules behind which they have entrenched themselves?"

One guess tells us that this reader is suffering from a well-meaning mother or aunt, perhaps, who has the fault of generalizing, who says, "This is the way to handle a husband," without knowing the man; "That is the way to bring up a child," without considering the individual child; "There is the way to happiness," without regard to whose happiness is in question, and the fact that each of us must judge what constitutes happiness for ourselves!

Life is so complicated and people so very different that it is foolish to generalize. The older we grow, the more we see this illustrated; the more evidence we find of the fact that it is neither fair to judge nor practical to advise one person by rules that fit another—that in the human equation the fact that something has happened one way is no proof whatever that anything will ever happen that way again! We should know, if we have lived at all, that rules about human beings are as full of exceptions as life is of surprise, and that for unimpaired, straight thinking we are best off regarding rules as so much excess baggage and discarding them altogether.

And yet people, and older people as a rule, fall victims to the temptation to generalize. They tell us how much freedom a daughter should have, how a mother should spend her time, what we should do with our money.

Women are most prone to this failing. Men usually are slower to form opinions.

"Kidding Ourselves Along"

"Well, it seems everything happens for the best," said that chubby, contented looking little Mrs. Smithers, "if John hadn't died he would have seen the disintegration of the business he loved; that would have made him very unhappy. And if my boy Bob had not been lamed as a child, he would have gone to France, and perhaps been killed or terribly disabled. So taking it all in all, I think I'm a very lucky woman. Everything happens for the best."

"Her son is lamed and her husband dies and she tells herself she's a lucky woman! She just kids herself along!" was the comment of a snappy young matron who had overheard. "I believe if the world came to an end she'd find a reason for rejoicing and be absolutely convinced it was all for the best. She kids herself along—that's all."

If that is true then there is a very wonderful gift in just "kidding ourselves along."

What is love but "kidding ourselves along"? It endows its object, a man or woman whom the world regards as a poor ordinary creature, with all the beauty, all the grace, all the charm, all the wisdom and all the glory of our own imagination. Through the rose colored glasses of love plainness becomes fairness, insignificance becomes radiance, mediocrity becomes splendor.

What is that but "kidding ourselves along"? And where would the world be without it? Then, too, it has happened that when people have "kidded themselves along" hard enough with reference to the qualities of some one they love, that the object of that self-delusion has in reality taken on some of the hue of their rose-colored glasses. In the words of the evangelist, love has "washed them clean."

Not only love, but beauty—where is that but in the eye of the beholder? And the divine harmony of sound—exquisite music—which exists only because there are ears that have been trained to understand and appreciate it? Are all those humans "kidding themselves along"?

And if the ear and the eye may be trained to see and hear beauty, why not the mind to understand and appreciate the beauty and good in the workings of Providence? If that be "kidding ourselves along" there is happiness in learning the art!

Sailor Not Desperado That Author Pictured

Capt. Alexander McLean, the notorious sailor whose exploits are pictured in Jack London's "Sea Wolf," had many harrowing experiences on the sea and escaped death miraculously many times, only to come to his death by accidental drowning in three feet of water at Vancouver, B. C. He had anchored his ship and in crossing two small boats to reach the dock, slipped and fell, struck his head on a gunwale and drowned while stunned.

He was by no means the aggressive ruffian pictured by London. He complained bitterly in 1907 about the way London had maligned him. He expressed a hot desire to be in a position some day to shanghai the author, and having him at sea, to put him through his paces in a way that he had never treated any man.—Vancouver Province.

Logical Answer but Almost Too Literal

The teacher was explaining the meaning of the word unit. After what was considered a clear explanation, she began to test the knowledge of the class. Picking up various objects, she asked what they were and each time received the answer, "A unit."

Finally, she took from her desk an orange. "And what is this?" she asked. "A unit," was the answer.

Taking her knife, the teacher peeled the orange and laid the pulp on her desk. Holding the peeling in her hand, she inquired: "What is this?"

The class looked confused, but thoughtful. After the lapse of a little time, a hand went up. "What is it, James?" asked the teacher.

"That is the skin of a unit," asserted James.

Poor Critics

"The young of this generation," said Rex Ingram in the smoking room of the Majestic, "are as honorable and virtuous as the young of the last generation were. The trouble doesn't lie with the young, it lies with their critics.

"One of their critics turned up at his office the other day wearing spectacles for the first time.

"'Are your eyes beginning to fail?' said his stenographer.

"'No, darn it,' the man growled. 'My eyes, at fifty-three, are just as good as they ever were, but the light nowadays ain't the same.'"

Law Taken Seriously

The English immigration law is rigid and formidable and the men who enforce it make no exceptions. When a cross-channel airplane crashed into a haystack near Dymchurch not long ago, killing three of its passengers and injuring twelve, immigration officials from Folkstone were quickly on the spot and the passports and baggage of all the unfortunate passengers were carefully examined. None of the uninjured was allowed to leave until these formalities had been completed.

Hollywood's Beginning

Hollywood, the goal of the world's movie-struck people, owes its rise to its obscurity. It was selected because of its insignificance not so many years ago. When the first studio was established there in 1911 the population was about 7,000. Today it is estimated at 125,000. With the rise of filmdom to power the fame of Hollywood spread. Although Hollywood became a part of Los Angeles in 1910 it still retains its name.

TEXAS TOWN CLAIMS MANY DISTINCTIONS

Only County Seat Without Jail, Is Boast.

Lefors, Texas.—This quaint town in northeast Texas has so many distinctions they must be enumerated in some kind of sequence. Among these are the following:

Lefors is the smallest county seat in Texas.

Lefors boasts that it is the only county seat without a jail. The jail has been leased to a neighboring town.

Though located on an otherwise treeless plain, the town is hard by a forest of giant cottonwoods.

This fact leads to another distinction. The town has the only saw mill in a territory larger than half a dozen northern or eastern states. There are no other saw mills out on the plains because there is no wood to saw.

The water wells are only nine feet deep in Lefors.

But perhaps the most interesting facts are these: The cottonwood trees bear grapes and virtually all the residents drink grape juice the year round, and although fifty years old this town's cemetery contains only four graves.

Near the town is the Valley of Lefors, formed by a branch of the Red river, which separates Texas from Oklahoma. This valley gives the impression that it is a corner of Japan or an imaginary kingdom in a dream. While the plains may be swept by cold winds, and the frost may creep down from the north, the Valley of Lefors is warm and cozy behind its rock wall shelter.

The towering cottonwoods do not actually bear grapes, but they support the wild grape vines that entwine them and hang down like veils. Here in protected dells grow fruits of all kinds, and the cherry blossoms enhance the Nipponese picture.

From the wild grape vines, a great crop of grapes is harvested every year. The juice of the grape is found in every home hereabouts.

When a man wants a well here he procures a post hole digger, bores down about nine feet and obtains clear, sparkling water.

For a generation Lefors has gone on drinking its grape juice and sawing its wood, and now oil is beginning to touch it with magic of life. The oil boom in the Panhandle is reaching into Gray county, of which Lefors is the exact geographical center.

The town with its dreamy valley is perking up. The cottonwoods are being transformed into new homes.

Find Bones of Mammoth on West Florida Coast

Washington.—The bones of a mammoth washed up on what were then the shores of Florida 500,000 years ago have been brought to the Smithsonian Institution by Dr. J. W. Gidley, as the result of an excavation at Venice, Fla.

The skeleton, though not complete, is the best yet discovered on the west coast of Florida. All the teeth were found, as well as the complete foot structure, the lower jaw, a tusk and a shoulder blade and part of the vertebra.

Some of the bones were broken and in the surface of the breaks barnacles, which are now fossilized, had attached themselves. From these facts Doctor Gidley deduced that the bones had been washed up on the old shore of the Gulf of Mexico, though this is now four miles inland from the present coast. They must have been quickly buried in the sand for they are very little corroded.

The fossil was discovered by the Venice company, a subsidiary of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, which immediately offered it to the Smithsonian Institution as a gift. The company's co-operation enabled Doctor Gidley to rescue as much of the skeleton as possible.

"This discovery," said Doctor Gidley, "seems to be a Columbia mammoth, types of which have been found in territories to the north of Florida."

Write Chinese Bible

Tokyo.—A Chinese porter employed by a mission here has just completed the work of translating the Bible into his native tongue on a large scroll. The work took him four years and three months.

Left Lincoln Pistols

Copenhagen, Denmark.—Three pistols presented by Abraham Lincoln to King Frederick VII were overlooked by thieves who broke into the Jaegerspris Castle museum here and made off with a lot of valuables.

Stamps of 1925 Would Circle Globe 11 Times

Washington.—The little postage stamp you use from time to time is one of a huge family.

There were more than 18,000,000,000 of them made in Washington last year, being sufficient for supplying each man, woman and child in the country with 160.

They represented a face value of $450,000,000 and required 900 tons of paper and 370,000 pounds of ink in their manufacture.

Placed end to end, they would girdle the earth eleven times. The cost of producing them was about 1 cent for each 125.

NEW WELLAND CANAL WILL FREE ONTARIO

"Cinderella of Lakes" to Take on New Life.

Toronto, Ont.—Lake Ontario, the Cinderella of inland seas, rejoices in the prospect of an early emancipation by the opening of the new Welland canal.

In every port on the great lakes shipping men and others are discussing what will happen in the new era to be inaugurated by the canal, which in some respects rivals Panama. There is much difference of opinion, but whatever happens will be an improvement for the ports located on Lake Ontario.

Here is one of the finest bodies of water in the world, 200 miles long by 40 wide. Surrounded on all sides by rich country and teeming cities, it ought to be alive with commerce. But the ordinary view of Lake Ontario is as lifeless as the picture of the "painted ship upon a painted ocean."

Imprisoned by Falls, Rapids.

Nature played a mean trick on Lake Ontario. It made her the connecting link between two of the most famous rivers in the world—the Niagara and the St. Lawrence—but the falls of Niagara and the rapids of the St. Lawrence, which millions of people have come from the ends of the earth to see, have isolated and imprisoned Ontario.

Great ocean liners come up the St. Lawrence to Montreal and stop. Great liners of the inland seas cruise Superior, Huron, Michigan and Erie, but they stop when they approach the mouth of the Niagara river.

It is true both the Niagara and the St. Lawrence have been canalized, but the ships than can be accommodated are small and the trips through the locks tiresome.

The new Welland canal will be revolutionary in its capacity. Instead of a draft of 12 or 14 feet it will provide a draft of 25 feet, which can be deepened to 30 feet. Instead of 27 locks, it will have only 7 locks, and 3 of these will be double locks in flight, enabling boats to ascend and descend.

Instead of 12 to 18 hours now required to get through the canal the passage wil be made in 8 hours or less. Ships of 12,000 tons, good-sized ocean liners, will be able to make the Niagara detour with ease.

Ontario Ports Looking Up.

A great milling industry has grown up at Buffalo, N. Y., and Port Colborne, Ont., because all the larger grain ships from the head of the lakes were stopped by Niagara. Now all the ports at the eastern end of Lake Ontario are getting ready to capture or at least share in this trade. The large boats will be able to get down the St. Lawrence as far as Prescott, Ont., and Ogdensburg, N. Y., but as the channel through the Thousand islands is tricky the ports of Kingston, Ont., and Oswego, N. Y., are more generally favored. Kingston, one of the most ancient cities in Canada, is preparing for a great revival.

Montreal also hopes to benefit. Freight rates" for the all-Canadian route will, it is hoped, be lowered (through as to this there is some doubt) and Montreal will be able to compete on more favorable terms with the Atlantic American ports. In any case, Montreal hopes to become a great milling center.

Toronto, in anticipation of the canals, has spent $20,000,000 on a harbor development and even if the achievement of ocean port status is delayed it hopes by more accessible coal and ore supplies to establish on its harbor front large new industries.

By the end of the present season 80 per cent of the new Welland canal undertaking will be completed. By 1930 at the latest it will be ready for traffic.

The cost will be well under $100,000,000.

Army Made 1,000 Flights Over Airways in Year

Washington.—During the last fiscal year army airplanes made approximately 1,000 flights over the eastern division of the model airways from Washington to Dayton. Commercial pilots also took advantage of the facilities offered on the model airways, recognizing the greater safety and ease of air travel over an organized and identified route.

Planes utilizing this route numbered 1,213, of which 959 belonged to the army, 14 to the navy, 14 to the marine corps and 66 to commercial concerns. In addition 166 planes flew over the route but did not stop.

Bering Sea and Straits Getting Much Warmer

Dutch Harbor, Alaska.—Bering sea and straits connecting the Arctic ocean are warming up, icebergs diminishing in size and fish ordinarily fearful of the cold migrating farther north, declare crews of whalers just back from the frigid regions. Seals and walrus have found the water of Bering sea too warm and were scarce except in the Arctic ocean this last season, while whales appeared more numerous in the polar waters than along the Alaskan coast. Herring, smelt and salmon, rarely frequenting Bering straits, have taken the old sealing grounds, say the whalers.

School for Gypsies

Uzhorod, Czechoslovakia.—The first school of gypsies in Europe will soon be established here.

WOMAN, 92, BOASTS 308 LIVING HEIRS

Challenges Any Grandmother to Show Equal Record.

Ogden, Utah—Boasting that she has the largest posterity of any woman in the country, Mrs. Sarah Jane Taylor of Harrisville recently celebrated her ninety-second birthday. She has 308 living descendants, who include 8 children, 50 grandchildren, 189 great-grandchildren and 61 great-great-grandchildren.

She has challenged any woman in the country to show a larger number of lineal descendants and is anxious to correspond with any such woman.

Mrs. Taylor has been married twice, the first time when she was only sixteen. The marriage was with Bailey Lake, a fellow Mormon convert whom the young girl met on her way to Utah in 1850. They settled in Ogden where four children were born.

When the youngest was still a baby Brigham Young pressed Mr. Lake into service and sent him to Idaho to spread the Mormon gospel among the Indians. With the other Mormon elders at Fort Lemhi, Lake was attacked by Indians. The little garrison, besieged, sent Lake as a messenger for help. He was ambushed and killed in the Malad mountains.

A few years later his widow was married to the late Pleasant Green Taylor. Six children, four of them still living, were born from this union.

Mrs. Taylor was born in Port Gibson, Miss., November 12, 1834. She has the distinction of being one of the few remaining Mormons who crossed the plains in oxcarts in the early fifties. She was among the religious followers who left the northern part of the state and went south when General Johnston's army came to Utah to subdue Brigham Young.

Eat in Darkness as Health Aid, Says Doctor

London.—With so much stress being laid on the virtues of artificial sunlight, special interest attaches to the announcement, made by a prominent London doctor, that we do not sufficiently consider the health value of darkness.

The authority states that in his opinion many of the ills that have their origin in digestive troubles are traceable to the too lavish use of light at meals. Brilliant lighting, he asserts, is harmful in dining rooms, restaurants and other places where meals are partaken.

Our digestive processes, on the perfect working of which human health and happiness so largely depend, are interfered with by the extra stimulant provided by garish lighting. The demands made on the senses by such factors as bright lights and arresting sounds mean that blood is drawn from the stomach to the brain and muscles, and the assimilation of food naturally suffers.

According to this authority the best light for meal times is that given by shaded candles. But we should all be better in health and in temper, the physician states, if we ate our meals in semidarkness.

Plan to Revive Whaling Off California Coast

San Diego, Calif.—After a hiatus of more than half a century whaling operations are to be resumed on an extensive scale on the southern California coast. A whaling fleet consisting of the factory steamer Lansing, with four killers, has established a base at South Bay, San Clemente island, and has started a hunt for the famous California "grays," the humpback and the sperm, the only species frequenting these waters.

The whale oil, fertilizer and chicken feed, the principal products derived from the whale catch, will be disposed of entirely in the California markets, officials of the whaling company announce.

Slump in Fur

Washington.—Fur coats may gain an enhanced standing as luxuries if the supply of fur-bearing animals continues to decrease as steadily as in the last year. The Agricultural department said the number of fur wearers was increasing much faster than fur bearers.

Canadian Farmer Seeks Meteor Buried in Yard

Detroit, Mich.—George Turner, a farmer living near Amherstburg, Ont., and a number of his friends, are planning to dig up what is believed to be a portion of a meteor that buried itself in the ground outside Turner's home.

The missile is buried about ten feet and the hole, which is about twelve inches in diameter, indicates that it must have been whirling at a great rate of speed when it struck.

"My wife and I were reading in the front room when my attention was attracted by what I thought resembled a pillar of flame," Turner said. "At first I believed the house was afire and I rushed out of doors, but I found nothing."

Turner plans to send the missile to the government laboratories at Toronto for examination.

Child, Five, Goes With House When It Is Sold

Los Angeles.—When a boarding and rooming house here was sold a month ago, it appears that five-year-old Barbara Carpenter was a chattel which went with it.

The house was purchased by Mrs. B. Hebard from its former occupant, Mrs. Grace Stark. Mrs. Hebard told police Mrs. Stark turned the child over to her, saying the mother would call for it in a few days. So far no mother has appeared, her name is unknown, and the child is unable to help the situation.

HARDENED CONVICT SHOWS CHIVALRY

Takes Blame for Crime to Shield Girl.

New York.—Arthur Murray has been in and out of many prisons since he was first caught shoplifting by Boston police 'way back in 1875. He is seventy years old, and he told in a bitter voice of having spent half his life behind the bars. It makes you hard, he said.

But, for all the bitterness, Arthur Murray hasn't forgotten the chivalry he absorbed in Boston more than half a century ago, when he was "straight." He stood up before the justices of special sessions and took upon himself all the blame for a crime in which he was caught with a nineteen-year-old girl.

Murray said he met Mrs. J. Erickson, nineteen, in a motion-picture theater. He went walking with her and, in passing the Oppenheim-Collins store, he said, he suggested going in for a bit of shopping.

"I was the one who took the hosiery and perfume," he insisted. The goods were valued at $4.65. "Mrs. Erickson knew nothing of the thefts. It was only her misfortune to be with me."

Store detectives' story did not bear out Murray's statements. The justices sentenced him to an indeterminate term in the penitentiary, which, in view of his record, was as lenient as it could be. Mrs. Erickson was remanded for sentence later. In the meantime probation officers will examine her record.

Dog Gives Life in Futile Effort to Rescue Four

Nashville, Tenn.—Rescued three years ago and given a home by Walter Gasser, a farmer near here, a forlorn little shepherd pup grew to become the playmate of the children of James A. Johnson, a tenant on the Gasser farm.

Now "Collie," the once homeless waif taken from the roadside, is dead. A blackened, singed, blinded and crazed animal, he surrendered life, but he had paid his debt of gratitude to those who befriended him. The dog failed to save the lives of Mrs. Johnson and her three children when flames enveloped their home, but he did not fail in his love for those who had shown him kindness.

When Johnson poured kerosene into a stove the liquid exploded, and the house soon was in flames. The dog raced into the house and pulled at the bed clothing of Maraline Johnson until she awoke and made her way outside. She was burned fatally in her dash for safety.

Then the dog leaped into Mrs. Johnson's room and awakened the mother. She died in an attempt to rescue her two small children in another room.

Meanwhile the dog ran outside again to the sleeping place of Arnold Hedigar, another tenant. Hedigar awoke as a howling, barking creature sank its teeth in his wrist and was gone.

"Willie" Stephens was asleep in the rear of a truck. He was to start for Nashville an hour later. Stephens was brought to the ground by the frenzied animal.

Then, as the two men ran to the fire, "Collie" dashed by them and leaped time and again in an attempt to gain entrance to the Gasser home. Then, after the fire, "Collie" was found some distance away, where he had crawled to wait until his burns should claim his life, sacrificed to duty—and love.

Priest, Nuns Survive 21 Raids by Pirates

Hongkong.—With their safe arrival at Kongmoon recently came the revelation that Father W. A. Fletcher and seven Canadian nuns had survived raids made by 21 different gangs of pirates on the steamer Waihoi, bound from Kongmoon for Yeungkong. The priest and the nuns were robbed and locked in a small stateroom for 60 hours. The vessel was looted.

Twelve well-dressed Chinese, posing as passengers, shot and killed the Chinese soldier guards, the purser, cashier and clerk of the Waihoi, beached the vessel, robbed the passengers and leisurely removed the cargo of kerosene, food supplies and furniture. The Chinese passengers were taken ashore by the bandits and held for ransom.

After the first party of pirates left the Waihoi 20 other gangs of robbers boarded the vessel at different times for loot. The last gang was reduced to stealing the shoes worn by the nuns and Father Fletcher's hat and coat.

"1927" Reads the Title

by Frances Marshall Morgan

THE dawn of another year—and we close the volume whose title page bears the legend, "1926" and replace it upon the shelf. It is dog-eared, now, smirched and outworn. Because they were read "too hard" some of the lines are dim—others show the blur of tears. Once so fair and spotless were its pages!

And the Moving Finger writes—on and on—endlessly—

To each new volume we turn with eager, outstretched hands. Our faces wear expectant looks. Our hearts beat high with hope and courage. 1927! What is stored between the covers of this new book? How much of joy? Of health? Is success written therein? How it thrills us to speculate on these absorbingly interesting matters—how brief will be the reading of these bright, new pages! Ah, me, if only we were allowed to linger a bit over some of the passages. Only too soon shall we reach the final chapter—and another book is done and the year ended. Yet—

Friends, may its memories hold more sunshine than of storm; more courage than faintheartedness; may the faith seem brighter than you had thought—and the Great Purpose of it all more steadfast and more sure.

An Old Man's New Year's Will

By MARION R. REAGAN

"GOOD morning, nephew; shut the door when you come in. Can't stand drafts like I used to. Getting along, you know. Oh, yes, I am. Ninety-six's a good age. Can't last much longer, I suppose. Sit down, nephew; put those bundles over yonder. Hate to see people fussin' with things. Beginnin' to feel a little wary this New Year's. Want to make a new will. You're a lawyer; you can tend to drawin' it up—wordin' and all that. I'll tell you what's to go in it.

"I want my entire property—real and personal—to go to Miss Elvira Mandar. Ah, I knew I'd startle you with that name. That's the girl your son's engaged to, isn't it? Well, that's not the reason I'm leavin' her my money, never fear.

"Ever hear your mother speak of the Campbells—John J. Campbell? Everybody thought it was wonderful the way I got into his business and rose from a clerk to head of the store. Forced old Campbell out. He died in the penitentiary three years later. Never knew the whole story about that, did you? Well, help me up on my pillow and give me a fresh glass of water and I'll tell you 'bout it.

"I was running after Campbell's daughter—crazy after her, and he wouldn't let her marry me. Said I was poor and worthless and come o' the wrong kind of folks. Never forgot it. Determined to crush old Campbell if it took my life. When the Wallins case came up against him I had my chance. It was the letters I produced that convicted him. You've probably heard all about that? Well—well—those letters were—false—forged! No, I'm all right, give me that water, that's all. Those letters I wrote myself. And the joke of it was that the people made a hero of me for tracking down the guilty. The board of directors made me president of the firm. The Campbells got poorer and poorer. Everything was paid out for the trial. It's been botherin' me all these years about them. Nobody to this day, but you and me, knows about the letters. Elvira Mandar is the granddaughter of old J. J. Campbell—only one of the whole lot that amounts to anything. I want her to have everything I've got. And, nephew, in case she needs money for her weddin', find out some good excuse for it, and send her this check. Where's that check I had a minute ago? Here, send her this $5,000—that'll keep her in fluffy things till I pass on. Give me that water again now and take this pillow away from my back. Don't look at me as if I was the devil's arch-criminal. Shut that door good when you go out. Good-by and happy New Year to you."

The Family's New Leaves

By FRANK HERBERT SWEET

LITTLE SALLIE crossed the room with great solemnity, raised herself on her tiptoes at the table so she could reach and open a book. She turned a leaf in this and then shut it, all with anxious care.

"What you think you're doing Sallie?" asked Ruth, smiling.

"Why, turning my leaf, of course," answered Sallie. "It's New Year's Day."

"A real nice start," cackled granny from her big chair. "Now, it's your turn, Ruth. Four to fourteen, a long step, so a leaf equally large."

Ruth grimaced and shook her head, then grew serious.

"All right. I won't miss my turn," she said. "See none of you do yours. Let's see, I can't give up my holiday dances, for that might disappoint others. I—I will burn my lipstick and color pot."

Grandma thumped approval with her cane. "Fine! Fine! Ruth," she encouraged. "Now, Tom, with four more years."

"I don't know a single thing I can—" began Tom, when—

"Good boy! Absolutely perfect," scorned Ruth.

A low puffing came from the big chair. Grandma was pretending to smoke a knitting needle. Tom groaned.

"Ugh!" he yielded. "Three months I will go without cigarettes. No more."

"Time enough to realize the benefit. Next."

"I promise to quit by Thursday, games and read aloud at home," rattled papa.

"And—and I to make waffles three mornings instead of one," promised mamma.

"And I," agreed grandma, "won't go to sleep while Jim is reading."

Sallie held the kitten's mouth to her ear. "And kitty promises," she said earnestly, "that she'll go out the door regularly 'stead of yelling at the window."

STORY FROM THE START

His task of putting down insubordination among his mercenaries being finished, Cesare Borgia, duke of Valentinois, is uneasy over the escape of one of his enemies, Matteo Orsini. Pantaleone is sent by Borgia to search for Matteo. Gaining entrance to the house of Almerico, Matteo's kinsman, Pantaleone pretends to be a wounded enemy of Borgia and wins the welcome of Almerico and his daughter, Fulvia, affianced to Matteo. From what he hears, Pantaleone feels that he is on the track of Matteo. Fulvia talks with the spy.

"Heigh-o! If it were mine to choose my estate in life, I would be lord of some such lordship as this of Pievano.

"The ambition is a modest one," said she.

"To have more is to have the power to work mischief, and who works mischief raises up enemies, and who raises up enemies goes in anxiety and may not know the pure joys of a contented life."

"My father would agree with you. Such is his own philosophy. That is why he has lived ever here, nor ever troubled himself to strive for more."

"He chose the better part, indeed," Ser Pantaleone agreed. "He has enough, and who has enough is happy."

"Ah, but who ever thinks that he has enough?"

"Your father thought so, and so should I think were I lord of Pievano. To one in your station bearing your name it may seem no more than mediocrity. Compared with what might be yours mediocrity it is. Therein lies the secret of your happiness."

"You make sure that I am happy," said she.

He looked at her, and for a moment was in peril of straying into by-ways concerned with her own affairs. But he conquered this.

"I were blind not to see it," he said in a tone of finality. "Though when I said 'you' I meant not only yourself, but your father also. And here lies cause enough. A noble lordship commodious yet compact, the villeins in the borgo yonder paying tribute and fealty, the rocca itself with all accessory buildings close-packed under its mothering wing—saving perhaps that pavilion yonder in the enclosed garden," he excepted, waving his hand and speaking idly, giving no sign that thus at last, having reached it by slow and careful degrees, he came upon the goal which had been his since first he took his seat beside her. "That, now," he continued, musing, "is an odd construction. I cannot think for what purpose it can have been built.

There was a question plainly in the statement, and at once she answered it.

"It is a lazar-house," she said.

Startled, Ser Pantaleone shifted uneasily, and there was no boldness now in the black eyes that stared at her. There was a sinister ring in the word that brought horrors leaping before the eyes of a man's imagination.

"A lazar-house?" he said, aghast.

She explained: It happened in the days when my father was no more than a boy. There was the plague in Florence, and it was carried thither to the borgo. Men were dying like flies at close of autumn. To succor them my grandfather ordered that pavilion to be built with others that have since been demolished, and he had the place enclosed by walls."

Ser Pantaleone twisted his features in a grimace of disgust.

"And do you keep that as a monument in honor of so ugly an event?" he asked.

"Why, no. There were other buildings there; but, as I have told you, they were demolished. That was the only one retained."

"But why?" he asked.

"It has its uses."

He looked at her with raised eyebrows, expressing a faint incredulity.

"You will not tell me that it is tenanted?" he asked in a note that was faintly jesting.

"No, no."

She spoke too quickly, he noted; and her voice had trembled, whilst those deep loyal eyes of hers had fallen guiltily away from his regard.

"No, no," she repeated. "Of course, it is not tenanted now."

He looked idly away toward the spot. She had lied to him, he was convinced already. Yet he would make assurance doubly sure. Suddenly he drew his legs under him and started half-rising with a sudden exclamation, his face averted from her and turned toward the enclosed garden.

And then he felt her hand upon his sleeve.

"What is it?" she asked, and her voice was breathless.

"Surely . . . surely, you are wrong," he said. "It is tenanted. It seemed to me that I saw something or someone move there in the shadow."

"Oh, no, no—impossible! You were mistaken! There is no one there!" Agitation quivered in every syllable of that breathless denial.

He had drawn from her the answer to the question he had not asked. Satisfied, he craftily made haste to reassure her.

"Why, no," he said, and laughed in self-derision. "I see now what it is—the shadow of that gnarled olive deceived me."

She rose. "Come, sir, you have sat here too long for one in your condition."

"Long enough," said Pantaleone with more truth than she suspected, and he rose obediently to depart.

It was as he said. He had sat there long enough to achieve his ends, and the very suddenness with which now she urged his departure was yet a further confirmation of what he had discovered. She desired to draw him from that spot before he should chance, indeed, to see what she believed him to have imagined he had seen. Very willingly, then, he went.

CHAPTER IV

A fool never doubts his judgment or questions its findings. He reaches a conclusion at a leap, and having reached it acts forthwith upon it. And that is why he is a fool. But your really astute fellow moves more slowly and with caution, testing the ground at every step, mistrusting his inferences until he has exhausted confirmation of them. Even where he is swift to conclude, he will still be slow to act unless urged by necessity to immediate action.

Thus Pantaleone. He had added link to link until he held in his hands a fairly solid chain of circumstantial evidence, from which he was entitled to infer, firstly—and this most positively—that Matteo Orsini was sheltered at Pievano; secondly—and not quite so positively—that he was bestowed in the lazar-house in that hortus inclusus.

A rash fellow would have summoned his men and forthwith stormed the place. But Pantaleone was not rash. He counted first the cost of error. He considered that, in spite of all indications, it was yet possible that his quarry might not be in that lazar-house. And in that case did he take any such action he would find himself in the position of a gamester who, staking all upon a single throw, has seen the dice turn up ambs-ace. He would have discovered himself in his true character, and must submit to being driven forth in ignominy to bear his tale of failure to his master.

Therefore, despite his stout convictions, Pantaleone waited and watched, what time he took his ease at Pievano and savored the hospitality of the Lord Almerico. He walked in the gardens with Madonna in the mornings, in the afternoon he would either permit Raffaele to teach him chess or repay these lessons by showing the golden-haired lad how to use a sword in conjunction with a dagger, and by what tricks—not tricks of swordsmanship, indeed, but of pure knavery—an adversary might be done to death; in the evenings he would converse with his host, which is to say that he would listen to the Lord Almerico's learned disquisitions upon life culled from the philosophy of Seneca or the teachings of Epictetus as preserved in the writings of Flavius Arrianus.

Has Fulvia said too much? How much does Pantaleone know about the lazar-house?

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

The Gift of Water

The gift of a drinking fountain to a city is the eldest of all such gifts. It was first given when libraries were for the priestly, learned few, and when parks were owned by savage, surly nobles. Thither the pigeons came, and gossiping girls with water urns, and grimed travelers, and paunchy merchants, and pariah dogs, and laboring horses, and even the beggars of the market place. And with an intemperate sun beating down upon them all these drank or drew water, in the democracy of thirst.

History of Suez Canal

The Suez canal, 92 miles long, connecting the Red sea and the Mediterranean, was built by a stock company organized in 1854 by the French engineer, De Lesseps. Work was commenced in 1859 and November 16, 1869, the canal was opened in the presence of the emperor of Austria, the empress of the French and the khedive of Egypt. The cost of the undertaking was somewhat more than $100,000,000. The canal is a sea-level canal and its completion reduced the sea voyage from London to India more than 3,500 miles. In 1875 the British government purchased the khedive's interest in the canal for about $20,000,000, and now owns the controlling interest.—Kansas City Times.

THE ENGAGEMENT RING

By W. E. LLOYD

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman.)

"AND you start for West Africa tomorrow?"

Bransome felt that the question was like an unwritten doom. He looked at Mary Starr in the moonlight as they stood outside Colonel Starr's conservatory.

Bransome had known Mary for five months. Colonel Starr, in whose regiment he was now a captain, had taken a liking to the young man when they were posted at Malta, and had invited him to his home in England. Now Bransome, with the rank of acting major, was to leave for West Africa to put down the rebellion of the Kru tribe in the recesses of the forests. And he loved Mary.

But he knew that she was engaged to Lionel Travis, the political agent among the Krus, who had made his escape to the coast after sanguinary fighting.

Yet they loved, and love was stronger than honor at that moment. They gravitated toward each other, and stood looking at each other, not daring to speak lest they betray themselves.

"If I meet Travis—" began Bransome at length.

"Yes?" Her word was like a caress.

"What shall I tell him?"

Mary took the solitaire from her finger. "Give him this," she said softly.

Bransome, incredulous, clasped her in his arms and their lips met. "You love me, dearest?" he murmured.

"I have loved you since we met. It is wrong, but it is better than a marriage that shall wrong Lionel and myself, too."

Before Bransome departed it was understood that they were engaged. And Lionel Travis' ring reposed in Bransome's pocket to be handed to the agent if they met. Bransome would affect ignorance of the contents of the little box. It was a cruel mission, but there was no way of getting a letter to Travis, who might be in any part of the coast.

Bransome sailed the following day, and fifteen days later arrived with his regiment at the coast town. All the interior was in a ferment. The regiment was sent up hastily to the base, where it halted while the pioneers cut roads through the forest. And it was there that Bransome met Travis.

He was to accompany the column as political delegate to the loyal tribes. The two men met, greeted each other warmly, though Bransome naturally showed something of constraint. Travis lunched in the mess, and they smoked their cigars together afterward. When Travis rose to depart to his quarters Bransome spoke of Mary Starr for the first time.

"She asked me to give you this," he said, handing him the little box containing the ring.

"Thanks!" said Travis indifferently, and slipped it into his pocket.

The column started a day or two later, Travis accompanying it. Often the men exchanged words. Bransome would look curiously at Travis, but he could gather nothing from the agent's inscrutable countenance.

There was, however, little time for thinking. On the sixth day, the enemy's stronghold was sighted. The messenger who went forward with a summons to surrender was met with defiant shouts from the negroes. Half an hour later the seven-pounder opened fire on the rebel stockade.

A fusillade of elephant guns followed, but few of the attacking party were hit. Presently the guns ceased; a breach had been made in the strong walls built of hardwood logs and almost as resistant as cement and mortar.

The regiment spread out in line. Bransome ran before them, waving his sword. "Advance!" he shouted.

Then he saw Travis beside him in his civilian clothes. The agent's white solar helmet made a splendid mark for an enemy. "Go back, you fool!" Bransome shouted.

But Travis ran beside him, and Bransome had no time for argument. The whole line followed, with fixed bayonets, roaring behind him. The bullets churned among the trees, and cut splinters from the boughs. Showers of leaves came down.

The yelling, defiant Krus manned the walls of the breached stockade. The assaulting party was compelled to form into column to mount the breach. And now the enemy displayed its secret resource, nothing less than an old brass ship's gun, which might have done service in the sixties, and was none the less effective here. A roaring detonation, and grape shot burst among the British troops. They fell in heaps, cut down by the well-directed charge.

But the gun was, of course, not a quick-firer, and had to be reloaded. The troops closed up. Bransome, who had by some miracle escaped unscathed, put himself at their head again. "Advance!" he shouted.

And again he was conscious of Travis in his white helmet, cool and smiling beside him.

It was a mad rush toward the walls. The foremost man set foot in [illegible] the cannon roared again. The files were swept away. And again Bransome found himself uninjured.

"Now, boys!" he shouted, amazed to find that he was still alive.

The attacking party, which had recoiled, heaped one man against his neighbor, and, the dead all about, rushed forward, cheering. Like a cataract the khaki-clad column swept over the breach, driving the dogged negroes before them, pinioning them with the bayonet. In a moment the fort was carried.

From hut to hut the flying Krus were pursued. They fell in writhing heaps, their own gun turned against them. For perhaps half an hour the bloody struggle lasted. Then the British were in possession of the village.

Bransome stopped. He had forgotten everything in the excitement of the battle. His sword was bloody, and yet he could not remember having struck down a man. A trickle of blood was running down his face. He limped from a slug in his leg that he had never felt.

He posted his men in various quarters; this done, he remembered Travis.

"Where's Travis?" he demanded of his surviving captain.

The agent could not be found. Yet it was Travis who represented the majesty of the British raj, and it was Travis who must interview the trembling old king now a prisoner in his own mud hut, guarded by a sullen, defiant chief wife, and a younger one, who held the royal red parasol over him.

Bransome went back, searching among the fallen. Travis was not in the town; he was not anywhere within the fort. Bransome came upon him at last just outside the breach. He had been struck down by a dozen slugs from the brass cannon the second time the weapon was discharged. Travis lay under a pile of dark Krus, but he was alive. He recognized Bransome.

Bransome hailed the stretcher-bearers and had two men place him upon a stretcher and carry him into the town. They brought him to the king's hut, and Travis pronounced sentence. The king was to go into exile to the coast, to spend the last of his days there.

The surgeon came up, looked at the agent and shook his head. "There may be a chance for him," he said. "Get him out of here. Put him in a hut that hasn't been used. There's smallpox everywhere among the Krus."

Travis did not catch smallpox, but it became clear, after a week of delirium, that he was dying. His mind grew clear toward the end. He motioned to Bransome to open the little satchel he carried with the government papers.

Bransome did so, and found in it the little box containing Mary's ring. He looked at Travis and saw that the agent's eyes were fixed upon it. He put it in Travis' hand.

With fingers that almost failed him Travis slowly pulled off the cover and held up the diamond ring. It was incongruous to see the gem sparkling in the dying man's wasted hand. Travis motioned to Bransome to bend down.

"The engagement ring I gave her," he whispered. "She is as true as gold, old man."

"Yes," agreed Bransome.

"We were to have been married when this cursed business was over. Now we shall never marry. I want you to marry her, Bransome. You're about the only man that's fit for her."

Bransome winced and tried not to show the emotion on his features. But Travis was too far gone to see anything except the face of Mary Starr that floated before him.

"I wrote to her, telling her how I longed for her in the silence of the brush," Travis whispered. "I said I had looked at her photograph and her mementos again and again. I wanted something else to bring her vividly before my eyes. And she—she sent me this. Nothing could have been a truer pledge of her love. A girl doesn't like to part with her engagement ring, Bransome."

"No," Bransome agreed.

And the irony of the situation struck into his soul. Travis had lived in the belief that his sweetheart was true to him, and he would die not knowing what the return of the ring meant.

They buried him the following dawn under a cairn of stones. And Bransome, having done his duty to the dead, allowed his thoughts to turn toward the living. The past seemed obliterated—at least it seemed to be symbolized in the gem that sparkled in the dead hand under the damp soil of Africa.

Wire-Drawing Machine Marvel of Ingenuity

In the manufacture of certain kinds of wire, especially fine aluminum wire, a machine is used that is surprisingly similar to the spinning apparatus in a modern cotton mill. In fact, it is a mechanical twister, by which the wire is separated from what might be called the supply coil into strands of the requisite thickness and wound upon spools. The supply coil passes over a pulley above the spindles and through what might be called a drawing frame. From this it is carried to the spools of a certain size. From these it passes through a second drawing frame, which decreases its diameter, again winding it on spools, the third drawing frame turning it into the size required for commercial use.

While some of the machines will draw out enough wire to fill 20 spools at once, so complete and so simple is the mechanism that but one person is needed to attend each machine.

Muskrat Landlord to Many Wild Creatures

That industrious little architect, the muskrat, it has now been learned, builds not only for himself, but for numerous other inhabitants of the wild places. Or, to be exact, he builds a house for himself and the other creatures volunteer to assist him in using it. Observations made at the college of forestry at Syracuse university prove that several kinds of wild ducks and geese and the green heron frequently find a nesting place in muskrat houses. But more surprising is the fact that snapping turtles and painted terrapin nest in these ready-made lodges, laying their eggs there and even retreating to the muskrat burrows for their long winter sleep. The observer also noted the case of water snakes that had moved in with the animals and were using its water-filled plughole as a domicile. The astonishing thing is that the intruders are seldom molested, but appear to live in friendly relations with the owner.

A Mixture

The best mixed metaphor, the most elaborately mixed metaphor in Harry Leon Wilson's large collection is taken from one of the novels of Gilbert Frankau, whose recent American lecture tour failed lamentably.

The metaphor runs:

"The cloud that tried to stab their happiness was only a false rumor whose bitter taste could not splinter the radiance, dim the effervescence or blacken the fever of their joy."

Women's organizations of Australia are asking the government to grant a perpetual lease of 500 acres and a subsidy of $125,000 to establish a textile industry to make materials from waste products of the country. Mme. Rhapsody on The New Year

The arrival of the new year was a very mild occasion here. It reminded us of the year with the big thaw. The thermometer has been almost a useless article since the new year blew in on the wings of a warm wave that made the snow leave the housetop in big drops. We appreciate the way the weather man is treating us, and dare say he can turn on the heat a little more as some of the snow we have here needs to settle about three feet under the sod so as not to cause the boat manufacturers any inconvenience, which it may if it loafes around here until some time next summer and then makes a grand rush.

A. L. Carlson and family were entertained at the J. P. Augustine home on New Year's day.

O. E. Sovde and family were entertained at the Leonard Swan home on Sunday.

P. L. Anderson and family visited at the Racine Olson home on Sunday.

New Year's Hop

The Ringbo eight-piece orchestralala played here New Year's Eve to a "hop" which everybody who attended it enjoyed. The old year was danced out and the new year was ushered in amidst great revelry and oodles of sweet melody.

A number of young folks were entertained at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Ludwig Larson Saturday evening.

Torger Ness and son Theo. motored to Greenbush New Year's Day to visit relatives.

Miss Ida Sovde returned to Greenbush Saturday after a few days visit here at the home of her brother, O. E. Sovde.

Dr. L. R. Twete, the only graduate licensed veterinarian out of Thief River Falls, made several calls around Holt last week.

SCHOOL NOTES

Our school reopened its doors on Tuesday morning after a two weeks vacation, to begin the sixteenth week of school this season.

All the teachers returned on Monday from their homes and all reported having had a very enjoyable vacation.

The first and second grades have a lost and found box. In this box are placed all the articles found by the pupils in that room, such as, pencils and handkerchiefs. During recess periods those who have lost articles may go to the box and take what belongs to them.

They have now a community scene on their sandtable. There is a community church and also a few living houses. The scene is not lacking in ammusement. There is an ice pond on which a group of children are seen skating, also a hill down which children are coasting with their sleds.

The plants in the first and second grade room froze over vacation with the exception of one which was cared for at one of the homes.

The first graders have learned the alphabet which they can not only give from memory but are able to tell the sound of each letter.

The Ancient History class is studying the literature of the Greeks.

STORY FROM THE START

His task of putting down insubordination among his mercenaries being finished, Cesare Borgia, duke of Valentinois, is uneasy over the escape of one of his enemies, Matteo Orsini. Pantaleone is sent by Borgia to search for Matteo. Gaining entrance to the house of Almerico, Matteo's kinsman, Pantaleone pretends to be a wounded enemy of Borgia and wins the welcome of Almerico and his daughter, Fulvia, affianced to Matteo. From what he hears, Pantaleone feels that he is on the track of Matteo. Fulvia talks with the spy. From her he learns of the existence on the castle grounds of a lazar-house (place for smallpox sufferers). Questioning her, he begins to suspect at last the place of concealment of Matteo.

He earned, however, little discernible reward for all his patient pains. No such confidences as he hoped for were ever reposed in him. Matteo Orsini's name was never mentioned in his presence, and when once he mentioned it himself to speak in glowing praise of the man and in a proper sorrow at his reported death, he was met by a silence that showed him how far, indeed, he was, their amiability notwithstanding, from having earned their trust. And he had other signs of this. On more occasions than one his sudden coming into their presence was marked by as sudden an interruption of the conversation between them, and the ensuing of a constrained silence.

Thus a week passed in which his mission made no progress, whereat he was beginning to grow restive, feeling that if his inaction endured much longer it might end by thrusting him into a rashness. No single shred of confirmation had his conclusions received, no single grain of independent evidence that the lazar-house was tenanted. And then, at last, one night as he was taking his way to bed lighted by Raffaele, who was now become his body-servant, he chanced upon a small discovery.

His own room was over the rocca's vast courtyard, and commanded no other view but that. But as on his way to it he passed one of the windows facing southward towards that hortus inclusus, and as idly he looked in that direction, he caught the yellow glint of a point of light that was moving toward it through the darkness.

He was satisfied that what he did any man in his place would have done, and, therefore, that it could awaken no suspicion. He stood still, looking at that light a moment, and then drew the page's attention to it.

"Some one is roving in the gardens very late," said he.

Raffaele came to stand beside him, and pressed his face against the glass, the better to peer into the darkness.

"It will be Mario," said the boy. "I saw him standing by the door when I came up."

"And what the devil does he do in the garden at such an hour? He can hardly be gathering snails at this season of the year."

"Indeed, no," agreed Raffaele, clearly intrigued.

"Ah, well," said Pantaleone, who perceived that he was wasting time, since Raffaele had no knowledge to betray. "It is no affair of ours." He yawned. "Come on, my lad, or I shall sleep where I stand."

First he thought of alluding to the matter casually upon the morrow, watching the effect upon Almerico and his daughter. But sleep brought sounder counsels, and when the morrow came he held his peace. He walked as usual with Madonna in the garden, though never now on the upper terraces whence a view was obtained of the enclosure about the lazar-house. She had refused to repeat that visit of theirs to the garden's height, ever pleading that she found the ascent excessively fatiguing.

Pantaleone habitually wore a tiny gold pomander ball, no larger than a cherry, suspended from his neck by a slender chain of gold. He wore it as usual that morning when they went forth together; but had Madonna observed him closely she would have noted that at a stage of their sauntering it vanished.

Pantaleone remained apparently unconscious of its disappearance until toward the third hour of night—after they had supped and when it was usual for them to retire to bed, the hour, in fact, at which last night he had observed that mysterious light in the garden. Then it was that quite suddenly he leapt to his feet with an exclamation of dismay that provoked their concerned inquiries.

"My pomander!" he cried, with all the air of a man whom some great mischance has overwhelmed. "I have lost it."

My Lord Almerico recovered from his concern and smiled. He quoted the stoic.

"In this life, my friend, we never lose anything. Sometimes we return a thing. That is the proper view. Why, then, all this concern about a pomander, a trifle that may be replaced by a ducat."

'Should I be so concerned if that were all?" cried Pantaleone, with a faint show of impatience at the philosophy with which Orsini bore another's loss. "It was my talisman—a potent charm against the evil eye given me by my sainted mother. For her sake I hold it sacred. I would sooner lose all I have than that."

It made a difference, Monna Fulvia agreed, admiring the filial piety he displayed; and even her father had no more to say.

"Let me think, now; let me think," said Pantaleone, standing rapt, fingering the cleft of his shaven chin. "I had it this morning in the garden—at least I had it when I went forth. I . . . Yes!" He smote fist into palm. 'It was in the garden—it must have been in the garden that I lost it." And without a by-your-leave to his host he swung to the page.

"Some One Is Moving in the Gardens Very Late," Said He.

"A lantern, Raffaele."

"Were it not wiser to wait until daylight?" wondered Almerico.

"Sir, sir," cried Pantaleone wildly, "I could not rest, I could not sleep in my suspense, in my uncertainty as to whether I shall recover it or not. I will hunt for it all night if need be."

Forth into the night sallied he and Raffaele, each armed with a lantern, and straight they went to the first terrace. With their double light they searched every foot of the long walk, all to no purpose.

"Five ducats, Raffaele, if you find it," said Pantaleone. "Let us divide our forces; thus are we likely to shorten the search. Do you go up to the next terrace, and search that carefully, foot by foot. Five ducats if you find it."

"Five ducats!" Raffaele was a little breathless. "Why, the thing isn't worth more than half a ducat!"

"Nevertheless five shall you have if you find it me. I value it far above its price."

Raffaele sped upward with his lantern, leaving Pantaleone in the act of resuming his search over ground that had been covered already. The adventurer waited until the sound of the lad's footsteps had grown distant and until from where he stood the other's light was no longer visible. Then he passed behind a stiff box hedge, that would screen his own light from any windows of the house, and there without more ado he extinguished it. That done he crossed the garden with as much speed as was consistent with his care to make no sound. By a clump of larches within a dozen paces of the wall of the enclosure he came to a halt, effaced himself among the trees, and waited, watchful and listening.

Pantaleone's theory is almost confirmed. All that remains now is to close in on his victim. But will he?

Organ Built of Bamboo

Tuneful melodies of sweet, well-rounded tone still flow from the pipes of a bamboo organ built into the church at Las Pinas in the Philippines more than 110 years ago by the Augustinian fathers. This instrument is constructed wholly of bamboo cut from a jungle near the church. The builders treated the bamboo to make it impervious to the elements. The pipes were buried in sand for six months for seasoning and hardening as a protection against both the atmosphere and white ants, which attack nearly all wooden articles in that climate. In 1863 and again in 1882 the organ was damaged, the first time by an earthquake and the second time by a typhoon which blew off the roof of the church. It was silent for 29 years until in 1917 Father Faniel, a Belgian missionary, had it repaired and since that time it has been in constant service.

Fate Was in the Way

By DUFORD JENNE

THE lights of Marion's car, shooting up the road, picked up the glint of metal at the distant curve, and the next moment she saw that she was approaching what was evidently a wrecked car. Coming nearer, she pulled her heavy roadster to a stop. Then her headlights brought into sharp relief the figure of a man crumpled just beyond the twisted frame.

She slipped from her car and to his side. He was unconscious. Climbing down to the brook that followed the road, she brought cold water and bathed his face.

"Oh, I remember—the world turned over twice," he muttered.

"This is a bad curve, and the road is icy this time of year," she said. "How do you feel now?" she asked hopefully.

"I—" She felt him relax again into unconsciousness.

"There's just one thing to do," she thought to herself; "that is to take him back home—and that's the last place I want to go!"

Between them and the little wayside station to which she had been speeding there were twenty miles of country, and at the station there would be no possibility of medical aid, while her father was a physician spending the precious end of his vacation at his country home.

She revived the unconscious man, and, using her sturdy self as a crutch, she managed to get him to her car and into it.

"I am sorry to make you so much trouble," he said faintly.

"Never you mind," she said gently, wondering just what he would think if he knew that he had interrupted an elopement, that even now her lover was waiting at the wayside station for her, that the western express would soon be due—

"Why, he's slipped away again," she thought to herself, glancing at him, and, slipping an arm around him and under his head, she sent the car humming homeward.

The house was as dark as when she had left. She sounded her horn, smiling a bit as she realized the dramatic quality of the moment. The door opened and her father came out.

"What? You? Why—what does this mean? And who—an injured man? What does this mean, Marion?" he ejaculated.

"Explanations later, Dad," she said.

"Right, Mischief." He started to lift the hurt man from the car. "Great Scott! It's Norman Bradley—my old friend Bradley's son. He had written that he might be out to see us!"

She aided her father, whose swift skill soon made their patient comfortable; and as she glanced at him she made up her mind that she might have done worse than rescue him. But her thoughts were with the lover who had waited her coming in vain.

The next day brought her two unhappy times. In the morning she was called to the telephone, and over the phone came her lover's voice, bitter with accusation.

"But, Beals, I couldn't do otherwise," she urged.

His swift, prolonged reply left her cheeks flushed and her will on fire. As she hung up the receiver her father came near.

"Marion, is that scamp calling you?" he demanded. "And it is perfectly plain that you were planning to join him last night. Now—"

"Dad, let's not argue it! I was. I have tried—tried to forget him, but I love him," she added, weary and unhappy.

He looked at her in silence, then said: "Remember—I forbid you to marry him. You are all that is left that is dear to me," he said simply as she fled.

It was several days later that Norman, walking with her through the autumn-tinted grounds, said suddenly: "Marion, you and your father forgot I was lying in the library when you had your brief conversation about your—er—delayed elopement. It was over before I could warn you I was there. I am really sorry—if you love this chap—that I was fate in the way. I would offer to help you, but I want you myself."

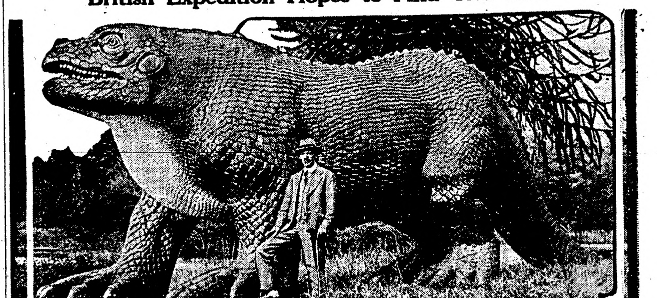
She tingled to the tips of her fingers as his gray, handsome eyes with the tender light in them, so different from the shifting, restless light in Beals' eyes, bent to hers.

"Oh, you do!" she replied. "But suppose I love another—and suppose I have made up my mind to join him just as soon as you depart, and father and I can have the scandal all to ourselves!"

He stopped suddenly, and pity rose in her heart as she saw his face pale. "Marion, if you love him so much, I will help you join him, but you don't know—that moment when I looked up, saw your face over mine, heard your voice—was the beginning." He said no more, his face gray with pain.

She slipped her hand under his arm, and said gently, "Is it as bad as that? Then, let me tell you a secret: Over the phone that morning Beals was so bitter, angry and harsh that something in me died then and there—what I know now was some sort of girlish fascination he had for me. And perhaps—perhaps you can take me away with you if you try hard, for—for when I held your head in my—No! not here—yet—but—one of these days!"

British Expedition Hopes to Find This Alive



Under the leadership of Lieut. Col. H. F. Fenn, a British expedition will soon start to explore the wildest sections of the Belgian Congo in search of strange animals of enormous size which natives have declared exist. The photograph shows Colonel Fenn standing beside a life-size reproduction of a prehistoric monster whose living replica will be sought.

Shaker Sect Is Fast Vanishing

Once Powerful Community Victim of Unscrupulous Exploitation.

New Lebanon, N. Y.—Fantastic religious dogmas that forbade marriage, insisted on absolute separation of the sexes and on equality of inheritance have thinned the ranks of a once powerful sect, the Shakers.

Only a handful remain here at New Lebanon, where the ruling body of Shaker elders once held forth, directing the destinies of flourishing Shaker communities along the eastern seaboard whose membership numbered thousands.

Only a single Shaker colony remains at Lebanon, Ohio, at one time a stronghold of the sect. Other colonies still extant but in pitiful contrast to their former condition may be found at East Canterbury, N. H., and Pittsfield, Mass.

History of Sect Strange.

Annals of the sect are strong and colorful. Under the leadership of James and Jane Wardleigh, in 1747, a group of Quakers, whose religious fervor caused them to twitch and tremble during services, separated from the main body and founded what they termed the United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearance. The term Shaker, first applied in derision by scoffers, was later accepted proudly by the brethren.

Dancing with which the Shakers accompany their religious rites is described as a picturesque ceremony. At the community house of worship, after exhortation by the elders, the males of the congregation would form ranks in a half circle, according to size and age, facing the women who were arranged likewise.

At a signal the choir would sing while the ranks moved up and down, swinging arms in rhythm, rising on tiptoe and shaking or swaying from side to side.

Shakers contributed much to America's trade in the early days. Possessing a reputation for prophecy and religious foresight, the Shaker communities drew into the fold the residents of surrounding neighborhoods who at that time were willing to give up their worldly belongings and live a life of celibacy.

The community became not only self-sustaining but wealthy. Shrewd Shaker farmers bought the best and richest lands for the communities, the Shaker workshops humming at broom and furniture making, their machinists invented the buzz-saw, and money rolled in on the simple people. Their furniture and other products became famous for soundness and appearance.

Exploited by Unscrupulous.

Exploited by unscrupulous leaders, the strength of the Shaker colonies was dissipated as their wealth grew. Religious fervor no longer flourished, the binding tie that held all in the community was broken, the socialistic principle of equal distribution abandoned.

Shaker evangelists began to encounter difficulty in gaining converts. With the promise of abundance no longer held out, people were skeptical of Shaker doctrines. The simple faith of itself possessed no common appeal, and thus the sect dwindled away.

Poor Scotsman Finds He's Heir to Fortune

London. — While playing a melodeon on the streets of Kirkcaldy, Scotland, to pick up a few pennies, and his only daughter was being cared for in a children's home, Andrew Hillock, a widower, fifty-eight, was told that he had inherited a fortune worth more than a million dollars through the death of his great-uncle, Andrew Hillock, in Australia nearly a year before. Hillock and his daughter recently left for Australia to view the extensive sheep ranches, fruit farms and a mansion surrounded by thousands of acres of fertile lands that now are his.

Slip Him the Prize as Cheekiest Person

Buenos Aires.—Juan Martinez gave a display of sheer "cheek" here recently that must stand unrivaled. Twenty-five years ago he deserted his wife in the greatest state of indigence to pursue the charms of another lady.

The wife went to work, and even succeeded in amassing a small capital. A short time ago she died and then the errant spouse appeared upon the scene and demanded his share of the estate.

But even the highest court he appealed to ruled against him.

Girls of Today Leave Lap Dogs to Old Maids

Croydon, England.—Up-to-date girls favor larger dogs, like the Alsatian, believing they harmonize with fashion, but the old maids and elderly women still cling to lap dogs and the toy poodles, say judges of the Croydon dog show.

The girl of today believes that her preference for the larger breed of dogs is an indication of independence and strength, the judges decreed after looking over the exhibits and their mistresses.

One woman judge said: "Alsatians look, and sometimes are, fierce, but they harmonize with the present-day fads and styles and therefore are popular."

COMPANY PLANS EIGHT-MILE BRIDGE ON CHESAPEAKE BAY

Project Calls for $10,000,000 and Would Bring Maryland Products Nearer World Markets.

Baltimore, Md.—Maryland's agriculturally rich eastern shore, with its canneries and oyster packing plants nearly fifty miles nearer Baltimore by highway and hence nearer the markets of the world, would be one of the outstanding results of a proposed eight-mile bridge span across Chesapeake bay.

The span, which would be perhaps the longest of its kind in the world, also would make the highway distance from the southern half of Delaware less to Baltimore than to Philadelphia, its present normal market.

Provided War department, congressional and other sanctions are forthcoming, the bridge will be started next spring by the Chesapeake Bay Bridge company, just chartered.

The company, the first of many predecessors which have toyed with the dream of a bay span to distill a thirty-year bridge romance into hard facts, is prepared to spend $10,000,000 in construction work. The bridge would be operated on a toll basis.

Previous groups, with the same end in view, have dreamed dreams of tubes under the bay, rapid ferry and barge fleets and trolley car bridges at costs estimated from $1,000,000 to $20,000,000.

The projected eight-mile span would be from 20 to 27 feet wide, set on concrete piling. It would be so placed that it would not interfere with marine traffic to the capes, and two draws would permit passage of vessels to the Susquehanna river and the Delaware and Chesapeake canal.

Erection of the bridge represents a difficult engineering feat.

Eskimos Tune in Radio to Learn Day of Month

New York.—Radio operators who keep two sets of batteries, one in the cook stove oven thawing out, while the other, in use, is freezing, were described by Dr. William H. Easton, New York chief of the Westinghouse broadcasting system, in a talk on radio problems north of the Arctic circle.

"Many Eskimos are radio fans," he said, "and among them is Pan-il-Pah, who was with Peary when Peary discovered the North pole." Virtually the entire white population of North America north of the Arctic circle is receiving personal messages regularly by radio, he said.

One of the uses of the radio, he said, is to inform inhabitants of sub-Polar regions of the day of the month. The days being all "nights" in winter, the population sometimes gets as much as eight days behind the calendar.

Twenty years is the most popular age for marriage among the girls of Japan.

BAD WEATHER OF 1926 EXPENSIVE

Research Fixes Cost at Over $500,000,000.

New Haven, Conn.—The inclement weather this year has cost the United States $500,000,000 and that of last June more than $100,000,000 alone, Prof. Ellsworth Huntington, research associate at Yale university and meteorologist, said here. This astonishing loss never was realized by the populace, however, because they were "still extraordinarily stupid," Professor Huntington added.

"Ever since the earliest men began to think," he said, "they have known that their happiness depends to a considerable degree upon the weather.

"Nevertheless, even in our day, we still have only the crudest conception of just what the weather is doing to us. The relationships between the sun and the weather and between the weather and the crops, and between crops and general circles of business are very complex.

"A solar condition which brings prosperity in one region is almost certain to bring calamity somewhere else," he explained. "When one region has unusually warm weather others may be cooler than normal; when one region is unusually stormy or rainy others are practically certain to be free from storms and to suffer from drought.

He pointed out that the financial panics of 1837, 1874 and 1893 came after several years of low rainfall over a wide area. He also said a short, overly hot spell would take more than the usual number of lives. He valued each life at $7,000, and showed that these willing heat spells had a very definite effect upon financial equilibrium.

His Family of Three Holds Down Ten Jobs

Morrisville, Vt.—Vermont's busiest family is the Sweetsers. Three of them—Truman H. Sweetser, his son Percey and his daughter-in-law Minnie—have between them ten jobs that they are actively engaged upon. Not political sinecures nor soft public service berths are these, but good, honest, every-day occupations.

Down on Brooklyn street they have just finished a new "business building" that houses most of their endeavors. In the front of the structure is the grocery store, managed by Mrs. Sweetser, who also is an expert stenographer and bookkeeper.

On the other side of the building the activities of her husband are housed. He is a plumber, tinsmith, steamfitter and dealer in stoves and heavy hardware. The rear of the establishment is given over to the young man's father, Truman H. Sweetser, who is a photographer and has his studio and laboratory there.

Besides taking pictures, Mr. Sweetser is a master mechanic and a carpenter, "turning his hand" to these tasks when he is not busy with his graflex and view camera.

While Percey Sweetser was serving in France with the Yankee division his wife was a yeoman at the Charlestown navy yard.

Russian Students Must Take Military Training

Moscow.—Military training for all university students, both men and women, has been ordered by the commissariat of war.

Under the order all students are required to take 180 hours of instruction in military science during their regular four-year course and two months' field practice during the summer. When their university course is finished the men must serve nine months in the army or, if they prefer, one year in the navy.

While the women students are required to take the course equally with the men, they are exempt from the two months' field practice and active service in the regular army.

As the new regulations apply to all universities and academies in Russia, tens of thousands of students will thus become potential soldiers.

Favors Music

New York.—Music, in the belief of George Eastman, is a potent antidote for the restlessness of spirit engendered by the drudgery and routine of modern business.

Indians Wealthy

Oakland, Calif.—The richest people in the world are the American Indians. Their per capita wealth is $4,700, nearly twice the All-American average.

Warn Against Rabbit Germs; Produce "Flu"

Washington.—An infectious disease known to science as "hueremia," which mysteriously emanated from the skin of a rabbit some six years ago, was made the subject of warning bulletins issued by the public health department.

Humans contract the disease during the process of skinning the rabbit. If the person has a slight cut on his hand, or a rash of any sort, he is more susceptible to the disease, which brings on an illness similar to the "flu." If the rabbit is properly cooked the consumer is in no danger, doctors said.

NAVY BUREAU LISTS ALL SEA DERELICTS

Ships Informed of Dangers to Navigation.

Washington.—While seas quietly lap the shores of the world, a vigilant maritime patrol, unknown to most "landlubbers," busily stalks the silent but treacherous foes to commercial shipping.

Icebergs, floating debris, land abutments, drifting buoys, derelicts and opaque fogs are constant menaces to navigation against which war must be waged. The nerve center of operations the world over is the hydrographic office of the Navy department.

This bureau tries first of all to keep a finger on the whereabouts of all dangers to shipping about which it is imperative, in safety's cause, to know. An elaborate intelligence service, enlisting co-operation of hydrographic services of other countries, assists the bureau to chart known impediments to water traffic, and send out warnings.

Report New Derelicts.

Constant communication with ships at sea, advising them of newly sighted derelicts, rafts and other things is maintained. The bureau supplies all navigators with information and asks their reciprocation by advising of the longitude and latitude of icebergs and other straylings. It immediately disseminates the news over all ocean highways.

Meanwhile the navy and coast guard annihilation squadrons are notified and patrols sent to visit the scenes of drifters and remove them.

A task which the coast guard tackled last July was to find and destroy 37 steel cylindrical pontoons which were lost from a barge that broke adrift off the coast of North Carolina, menacing coastwise shipping.

Hauled It In.

A target raft which had to be abandoned during a hurricane while it was being towed caused "policemen of the main" some trouble. After a ten-day search it was located, the position signaled to the hydrographic bureau and six destroyers were sent to look for it. The minesweeper Rail eventually picked up the tow and hauled it into port.

Reconnaissance patrols are maintained along water highways in the spring months to look out for errant icebergs. The patrols are withdrawn June 30 when it is assumed the shipping lanes are safe. The duty of patrol boats is to report daily the situation in their territories to the hydrographic office, which rebroadcasts twice a day warnings to mariners.

Invaluable service is carried on by radio from the hydrographic office for the guidance of open-sea navigators who may lack knowledge of conditions on approaching American shores. Radio compass bearings are broadcast to aid them.

Finds Yank Molder Has $17,000 Home

London.—English workmen have received a colorful picture of the American prosperity from J. T. Kay, trades' union official who visited the United States as a member of the mission to search for the secret of American high wages.

Mr. Kay told the institute of British foundrymen in Birmingham how, having a letter of introduction to a Pittsburgh molder, he called on the man unexpectedly to satisfy himself that the introduction was not a "catch" to deceive him.

A negro maid answered the bell of a fine house and said the molder was at dinner, but the man came out at once, resplendent in evening dress. Dining with him, also in correct attire, were his wife, brother and son.

After a pleasant evening, the host brought out his 80-horsepower car, drove Mr. Kay to his hotel, mentioning, incidentally, that he had paid $17,000 for his house and had $10,000 in the bank.

"I was assured," said Mr. Kay, "that that was a fair example of a man's achievement when he tried honestly to get on."

He Wears Same Suit 23 Years; She Sues

Lawrence, Mass.—When he took the witness stand in the local probate court, Matthias Florence of this city told Judge Harry R. Dow that he was married 23 years ago, had worn only one suit during that time, and that he has never been inside a moving picture theater.

His wife, Antoinette, is suing him for divorce on the ground of cruel and abusive treatment and he contested the action.

She testified he never gave her enough money to run their home, although he owns two tenement houses. She also asked for the custody of their two minor children. Judge Dow took the plea under advisement.

Drop in Weddings

London.—Weddings have dropped off more than 60 per cent in the South Wales coal fields since the dispute of the miners and mine owners threw more than 1,000,000 men out of work last May.

Must Pay Taxes

Paris.—Americans having "an habitual residence in France" must pay French income tax on all their revenue, whether derived from the United States or France.

SEEKS DEATH TREE IN DARKEST AFRICA

Explorer Goes on Long, Dangerous Trip.

Cape Town—A man who is searching for what is termed "the death tree" arrived in South Africa recently. He is Alex Clive, and he intends to penetrate into the heart of Africa to seek for the tree which means death to those who drop asleep beneath. The death tree, Mr. Clive declares, grows somewhere in the heart of Africa. It gives off a very powerful perfume which probably means death to an unwary person in its vicinity, for if anyone rests beneath it he is overcome by the scent and falls asleep never to wake.

This tree, Mr. Clive believes, contains same powerful drug which might possibly mean a great deal to science and humanity, but the death tree is not the only reason for the expedition, as he is also keenly interested in entomology, geology, and botany, and intends to collect specimens for exhibition in London, which, he hopes, with luck, to reach in about 18 months, and will place his specimens before the board of scientific research.

Mr. Clive states that he is proceeding to Bloemfontein and Durban, and thence to Lourenco Marques, Beira, Mombaza, Nairobi, and on to the Victoria falls, and Nyanza, where he will cross the lake to Kampala. At Kampala his quest for the death tree begins in earnest, as he will have to strike inland on foot.

Making of Matches Gives Jobs to Many

Wadsworth, Ohio.—"Got a match?" A simple request easily complied with, but not so prosaic is the story of the making of the wood sliver with inflammable tip.

The match starts its journey to somebody's vest pocket in a towering pine forest, hundreds of miles away from the final center of manufacture. Forests, railroads and sawmills are owned by the match companies, which have great factories here.

One company owns a great tract of timber in the Coeur d'Alene mountains of Idaho. A company railroad, 24 miles long, takes the logs to the main line of the Spokane International railroad, which hauls them to Coeur d'Alene lake, where they are put into booms and towed to the company's sawmill on the Spokane river.

The logs are sawed into two-inch planks and seasoned for a year or 18 months. When ready for use, they are sent to the company's block plant at Spokane. Selected lumber there is cut into blocks 2⅝ inches long, which is the exact length of a match. The blocks are sent to the factory here, a 2,000-mile journey.

The first manufacturing step is to feed the blocks into a match machine, which cuts them up and forces the sticks into holes in an iron plate, holding 500 sticks.

Over sprigs and brushes the plates are carried and all the weak and imperfect ones are automatically culled.

Next comes treatment by paraffin and chemicals. Then the first composition is put on the head. The sticks pass over a roller, which turns in a box containing the composition. The ignition tip is applied the same way.

The use of phosphorus as an active ingredient in match making was barred by congressional act in 1913. The poisonous phosphorus used to affect the bones and the jaw of workers. Sesqui-sulphide of phosphorus now is used, which is nonpoisonous.

Teach "Thumbing"

Omaha, Neb.—Scientific "thumbing" is to be taught. The national convention of hoboes has decreed that a field agent shall instruct hikers in the ethics of stopping motorists and indicating that a lift is wanted.

Happy Children

Willows, Calif.—Children in Glenn county are happy. All the high schools are on an enforced vacation pending settlement of a controversy between the teachers and the county treasurer over salaries.

"Brighter" Burials

London.—"Brighter" burials have been determined upon by the British Undertakers' Woodwork association. New casket designs are for beautiful and graceful workmanship.

Emulating Elephant Is Urged for Longevity

New York.—To be cool and calm at all times and impervious to the unpleasant titillation of nerves emulate the elephant, says Thomas R. Gaines, a lecturer before the Brooklyn institute on "The Science of Health."

The longevity of the elephant, Mr. Gaines asserts, is directly attributable to his poise and repose, and those in turn may be traced fairly certainly to his habit of slow breathing. The elephant breathes only five times a minute as compared with eighteen for the normal human.

While his audience made experimental sniffs, Mr. Gaines enunciated the requisite remainder of his theory:

"The general attitude should be one of wholesome indifference."

THE SHERIFF'S SWEETHEART

By T. R. GIBSON

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman)

I

"AIN'T satisfied with me? Why not? Did I ask to be elected sheriff? Didn't the town come to me and say they'd decided to nominate me?" asked Dick Farley.

He looked straight into the puckered eyes of old Jim Brant, who lowered his own unsteadily.

"You understand me, Dick, I only come to you as a friend," said the old man. "I thought there was something gone wrong between Doris and you, and I thought maybe she'd—she'd heard of what folks are saying."

"What are they saying?" demanded Dick.

"Why, that they guess you're taking your time about tackling Sancho," responded Brant.

Dick flushed angrily. He had been sheriff six months, and the notorious outlaw was still at liberty. Somewhere in the hills beyond the desert Sancho had his headquarters. He had descended on a ranch the week before and lifted a pure-blooded stallion. It had been Dick's business to arrest him; but how could he hunt him single-handed among the hills the other side of a blazing desert in midsummer?

Dick had not been idle. He had laid his plans through Lina, the dancer, Sancho's friend; and through her he knew the outlaw would some day fall into his clutches. He realized that public feeling had grown chilly; the people wanted something to be done, and done by him at once, alone.

Doris and he had been as good as engaged two months before. Dick had noticed the change in the girl, but he had not ascribed it to public gossip. Stung by old Brant's insinuation, he went straight to the house. Doris looked up from the porch and nodded.

"What's the matter, Doris?" Dick blurted out, coming close to her.

"The matter?" parried the girl.

"You've changed," said Dick hotly. "You are different from what you used to be."

"Did I ever give you the right to speak to me like that?"

"I hoped for it," said Dick, twisting his hat nervously. "It's because of what people are saying, isn't it?"

"What are they saying?"

"That I'm afraid to tackle Sancho. You pay heed to that sort of gossip, do you, Doris?"

"I am not answerable to you," Doris retorted. "You can go away now and do not come back till you are feeling better."

"If I go I shall not come back till you send for me."

"Please yourself," she replied, with affected indifference.

Dick turned without a word and swung into the road that led downtown. He could not see the flood of tears that followed his departure. Nor could he knew that it was his friendship with Lina, retailed by the town gossips, that was the cause of the change in Doris' attitude toward him.

Lina had taunted Dick of late. Why didn't he go for Sancho? she had asked him. Dick bore it patiently. Some time she would give him his clue, and then—well, Ausha would know what sort of man the sheriff was.

He had his reward sooner than he expected. For, as the girl ended her song that night, and came tripping through the audience, she stopped an instant at Dick's side.

"Sancho will be at my cabin tonight at half-past ten. Kill him if you can, Senor Farley. If you can't, take him away. I never want to see his face again, the traitor"! she said.

II

The cabin came into sight, perched on an elevation among the palms. A little stream of water ran beside it. The long ride across the desert was nearly ended. Dick's pony, scenting the water, pricked up his ears and broke into a canter. Dick dismounted in a thorn clump near the cabin and crept cautiously forward to where a candle shone in a window.

He crawled toward an angle of the shack, his revolver in his hand. Suddenly the door was flung open, and a bullet hummed past Dick's ear as the rifle in the doorway rang.

Dick's rush was too quick for the bandit. In an instant the sheriff had disarmed him. Sancho looked up into Dick's revolver.

His hands went up automatically. He scowled at his captor.

"Keep them up and walk through that doorway," said Dick. "If you let them down I'll drill five holes through you."

Sancho moved, cursing, toward the door. Dick followed him. Suddenly he felt Lina's arms tighten upon his neck from behind. At the same instant Sancho turned and dashed the weapon from his hand. As Dick struggled in vain a coil of rope tightened about his body, pinioning him. The outlaw rolled him to the floor and secured his legs with the end of the coil.

Sancho picked the sheriff up in his arms and carried him to the edge of the stream. He left him there, went away, and returned shortly with a mallet and some long iron pegs. Very deliberately he hammered them fast into the sun baked earth. Then he fastened Dick's arms and legs to the pegs.

"Good-by till tomorrow," said Sancho mockingly, gazing into Dick's upturned face.

III

He came back when the first streaks of red were in the sky.

"It will be warmer soon," he said, and ripped the shirt from the sheriff's back. He stooped beside the stream and, dipping up a hatful of water, poured it over Dick's chest. Dick shivered; the water was icy cold.

"Warmer soon," said Sancho, and went away. The sun appeared. Slowly it climbed above the horizon. Dick began to grow thirsty. The sweat streamed down his face and bare chest. About ten Sancho reappeared.

"Warmer?" he jeered, and held his water bottle to Dick's lips. He withdrew it the next moment and emptied it over his chest. "The desert's warmer than Ausha," he said, and kicked him savagely.

Dick groaned involuntarily. Blisters were forming where the icy water had wetted him. Beneath him he saw the cool waters of the stream. He writhed in his bonds as he tried to reach it. He opened his parched and crackling lips toward it.

Once, awakening from a stupor, he saw Lina running toward him with a pitcher of water. Then Sancho sprang up from somewhere in the shade and struck it from her hand.

"It is my fault, Sancho. I did not mean his death. Set him free," begged the girl.

With a curse Sancho drove her back into the shack. And then the sun climbed. Dick was no longer able to struggle; he was hardly conscious of his body, and it felt as if this tormented covering of his soul were something exterior to him.

When he opened his eyes again he saw Sancho with Lina beside the horses. The girl was pleading with the outlaw.

"Release him, and I go with thee," he heard Lina say.

The outlaw looked at her—then nodded.

"I shall give him water and set him free," said Lina, and went down by the water side with her pitcher, while Sancho strolled meditatively toward Dick.

"Warm?" he queried, tauntingly, gloating over his victim. Then, seeing that Dick was beyond his malice, he raised his revolver slowly.

Lina, coming up from the stream, saw him aim at Dick's head. With a scream she flew at him.

Sancho laughed, and, with his free hand, held hers down. And Dick saw the deadly revolver muzzle begin to cover his head again.

Sancho waited. He was in no hurry, and he wanted his enemy to taste death in all its fullness. But the girl was becoming a nuisance. He flung her from him, and, as she fell flat in the sand he aimed again.

At that moment Dick's attention was directed toward a singular gleam of light among the sandhills. There was nothing strange about that. The sun might be playing upon a stone. But, again, the light looked somehow like the glint of a rifle barrel.

Dick saw the outlaw's finger close on the trigger, saw Lina raise herself and stretch out her clasped hands toward Sancho in moaning appeal. Then the sharp crack of a rifle sounded among the rocks. The trigger finger stiffened. But Sancho's bullet plowed through the sand a yard from Dick's head, and Sancho stiffened, toppled, and pitched forward.

With a cry Lina flung herself upon her lover's body. And that was the last that Dick knew until he awoke to find himself propped up in Doris' arms, with the taste of cool water in his throat and the walls of the hut about him.

"Dick, forgive me, forgive me!" she was saying. "I knew that you had come here, and I was afraid for you, and I followed you to tell you that I love you."

Interesting to Note Origin of Surnames

It was not until after the Norman conquest that surnames were adopted. They were first given as nicknames to suit particular individuals. Today we rarely find any appropriateness in the names we bear. The greatest hero of the day may easily carry the name of Coward, while Mr. Fox may be anything but sly. Yet it is probable that the first man to bear the name of Fox was preeminent in cunning, just as the first Parrott, or Parratt, was most likely a great talker.

Many people were named by reason of their possession of some quality which was associated with a particular animal. Hart, for instance, was no doubt a great runner, and Nightingale could sing. As for the Ruddocks (robin redbreast) and Woodalls (woodwale, a woodpecker), they probably received their names from the signs they favored outside their doors.

The most interesting names are those which plainly originated through the occupation of those who held them. There is no doubt about Shepherd, Hedger, Herd, or Hoard. Ackerman was the man who drove the plow over the acres; Swinnart tended swine; and Calvert looked after the calves; while Wethered was a wetherherd, and Goddard a goat-herd.—London Answers.

Bizet Died a "Failure"

Bizet, the composer of "Carmen," probably the most successful of all classic operas so far as the scope of its popularity is concerned, died at thirty-seven, and it is said he was broken-hearted over the apparent failure of the opera on its first presentation.—Washington Star.

Old-Time Sports in Rural Bavarian Districts

Bavaria is the most old-fashioned part of Germany, and one may see in some remote villages customs that have survived for hundreds of years.

Recently a new Catholic priest was ordained in the little village of Rosshaupten. As usual, the religious part of the ceremony was followed by all kinds of worldly festivity, including the climbing of the "maypole."

The highest tree in the local wood was felled for the purpose.

The branches were lopped off, the bark was peeled and a green wreath of pine branches was hung around the topmost sprig.

It is no easy matter to shin up such a tree, over a yard in circumference near the foot. Indeed, it is so dangerous an undertaking that married men were forbidden to make the attempt.

As a progressive Dairyman desiring to secure maximum profits from my milk herd, I realize the necessity of adhering to an organized schedule of care, feeding and handling.

Taking inventory, I have decided that pure milk is better than purified milk and that I want not more cows, but more and better milk from each cow.

Any cow in my herd suspected of being a boarder or otherwise lacking in necessary qualifications shall undergo a fair, but thorough test. What I spend on my herd must come back to me at a profit.

My first step should be the selection of a true type herd sire—a selection which should always command great care and good judgment.

During the hot months, whenever possible, I shall supply my herd with a cool, clean, outside resting place, where they may chew their cuds in peace and ruminate on the blessings of being a provider rather than a parasite.

Proper selection of dams also will bring its own rewards in more milk, better milk and better animals.

A dirty condition like that pictured here shall never prevail in my herd. Rather than scrape, curry and brush endlessly, I shall clip and quickly clean thoroughly by wiping with a damp cloth.

The comfort of the animal is important. Thorough cleaning aided by periodical clipping about flanks, udders and underlines during stable months and all over the body when turning out in the spring shall be part of my program. Clean animal, clean milk with low bacteria count.

A clean barn, clean plentiful bedding, water at the stanchion and no milking within an hour of feeding are all part of the program which I shall enforce rigidly.

The growth in the number of cow testing associations convinces me that membership in one is a good thing. I pledge my association full support and co-operation.

The dairy or creamery that buys my milk must value quality and sanitation as much as I do. They must carry on from the point beyond which I have no control.

Proper feeding is essential. Therefore I shall always provide a carefully balanced ration to my herd, as well as a plentiful supply of pure, clean water.

Then when my milk is bottled I shall know I am repaid for my efforts. I shall get more milk and more money for my milk and the gospel of clean and better milk shall spread throughout the land.

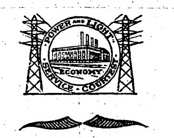
Electricity Is Your Sun
In Winter



In winter more artificial light is required each day. Engineers estimate the average minimum hours per day that electric light is needed each month as follows:

January	6.53 hours	July	2.60 hours
February	5.38 "	August	3.15 "
March	4.10 "	September	4.00 "
April	3.48 "	October	4.90 "
May	2.95 "	November	6.18 "
June	2.55 "	December	6.85 "

According to these figures your electric bill for December should be two and one-half times as much as your bill for June. Short days and long nights mean larger electric bills.

Thin Cream

Thin cream causes an unnecessary loss of skim-milk. It has a poor keeping quality. It costs the creamery more to handle and churn thin cream than it does richer cream.

Cream testing from 35 per cent to 40 per cent in the summer time and 30 per cent to 35 per cent in the winter is best for both producer and creamery. A Land O' Lakes cream should test at least 25 per cent. This is the official standard, and it is our wish that our patrons check up on their test and see if their test complies with the rules.

Steinhauer heads the list again for November while Davis steps from 4th to 2nd place. Voth sold 2 of his best cows which is why he drops back to 3rd place, Augustine made a remarkable stride, he did not appear on the Oct. report yet in one month he landed in 4th place before he anchored. John Holst holds 5th place same as in October report.

The month of November is always the lowest month in the year in butter production-nevertheless we are making approximately 8 times as much butter this November as we did for the same month 17 years ago. It is during the winter months our increase in volume has shown-up the greatest.

I have often mentioned the importance of frequent deliveries yet it can not be brought to the patrons attention to often. It is not neccessary to wait until the can is full of cream before you deliver same-let it be only a few pounds. It means more work for us to weigh in your cream every cream day yet we are more than willing to do that if you will cooperate with us in delivering your cream every cream day. It is no small job for the patrons that lives a long ways from town to come in often, particularly during the cold winter months and roads are closed as far as automobile driving goes. Exchange with your neighbors is the best way as well as the cheapest way in delivering your cream. Where patrons can agree to cooperate to the extent of hauling their cream together you will always find that they will cooperate in many other ways which helps a great deal towards a better understanding and feeling among neighbors which is necessary in a community if we are expecting to prosper and feel satisfied with our toil. Friends we must have and why not try and make your nearest neighbor your best friend.

This idea of thinking that you can get along without your neighbor is all "bunk". We are all here and why not start the New Year right by trying to get-together with your neighbor, businessmen, church, school and any other organization that stands for community service, let it not only be done in words but more so in practice.

Some of our neighboring creameries have rules as follows. If you can not deliver your cream before noon your cream will not be graded a Land O' Lakes. We are not going to be as strict with you but we must emphazise the fact that all of you should try to get in before 1 p. m. It can be done if tried and if the weather is not too bad.

How is your test? If too low be sure and raise it to thirty per cent.

Submitted by P. L. Anderson.

SCHOOL NOTES

The high school class in physiography have practicaly completed their work. Only the examination remains which will be given on Friday this week and Monday next, since it is devided into two parts.

The course in physiography will be replaced the second semester by a course in botany. The new course will begin some time during the first week in the new semester which begins on January 24.

We will now officially announce that a radio broadcasting station is nearing completion. It will be ready to "annoy" you on or about January 22. This has no connection with our classes but we hope that a physics department will be placed in our school by next year, in such a class. We expect to give all who are within ten miles and who are interested in our school, a little treat by "air". Although this transmitter is comparativly small and of low power, we hope that soon we can boast of a larger station. Get your radios ready.

The eight grade reading class has begun the study of Longfellow's poem "Evangeline". Each student keeps a record of the poem by following up his daily assignments with an outline of the poem, dictionary work, connotations and topics for an elementary thesis.

The pupils of both the 7th and 8th grades are interested in the new automobile chart. Each day the pupils receive a ticket which gives them a ride in one of the cars, running from 100 per cent to failure. This ticket represents the average mark of that sdudent for the day. At the end of the week the average of both grades are submitted and the car bearing that average is the first to enter San Francisco, the final goal.

The fifth and sixth grades are keeping individual graphs for reading which show their progress in reading, as recorded by weekly reading tests.

The 6th graders just finished an interesting study of Switzerland.

The 3rd and 4th graders have been studying letter writing. Each pupil has written a letter to one of his friends or relatives.

Nelius Nelson Susrenders

The last chapter in the story of the burning of the Centrsl Hotel at Bagley on October 8th, 1925 was written into the records of district court at Bemidji before Judge C. W. Stanton Friday of last week, when Nelius Nelson, former owner of the hotel, appeared before the court and pleaded guilty to the willful destruction of property and was fined $100.00 and costs, taxed at $50.00.

At the term of court in April 1926, Nelson, who was owner of the building, jumped his bail, of $1000.00 which was collected.

A bench warrent was issued for Nelson who has been a fugitive from justice since. Tired of dodging the officers of the law Nelson gave himself up. In view of the fact that Nelson had been the "goat" in the deal the court was lenient and let him off with a fine and costs.

A Foxy Story

We have recently heard a lot of stories of Blue foxes and Black foxes and other foxes, but the following is we believe, the foxiest story of the season:

Hjalmer Johnson procured a pair of foxes about three years ago, and started in fox-farming. He had good luck, getting six young ones the first year making a total of eight.

By various means, these eigth were reduced to two, and these he has kept for two years, trying to raise more. More than once did old Jim scratch his head and wonder why the foxes did not have any young ones, so last week he got tired of feeding them and decided that the quickest way to get rid of them was to kill them and sell the skins. Then, to his surprise, he found the reason why they never had any young ones.

The two he had kept, which had kept him worrying so long, were both females.

Jim is laughing yet, and so will others be, after reading this story.

The Way of a Maid with a Man

STORY FROM THE START

His task of putting down insubordination among his mercenaries being finished, Cesare Borgia, duke of Valentinois, is uneasy over the escape of one of his enemies, Matteo Orsini. Pantaleone is sent by Borgia to search for Matteo. Gaining entrance to the house of Almerico, Matteo's kinsman, Pantaleone pretends to be a wounded enemy of Borgia and wins the welcome of Almerico and his daughter, Fulvia, affianced to Matteo. From what he hears, Pantaleone feels that he is on the track of Matteo. Fulvia talks with the spy. From her he learns of the existence on the castle grounds of a lazar-house (place for smallpox sufferers). Questioning her, he begins to suspect at last the place of concealment of Matteo. Pantaleone's theory is almost confirmed. All that remains now is to close in on his victim. But will he? Continuing his work of spying, Pantaleone from a hiding place sees Mario take food to the lazar-house, and all doubt is ended.

Moments passed in utter silence. In the distance he could perceive the faint gleam of Raffaele's lantern moving at a snail's pace along the third terrace on the hillside. Raffaele he knew was safely engaged for the next hour. That promise of five ducats would sustain his patience against failure, whilst any who might be spying from the house would be able to make out no more than a glimmer of light up yonder, and would suppose that Raffaele and himself were engaged together.

Reassured on that score, then, Pantaleone was patient on his side, and waited. Nor was his patience sorely taxed. Some ten minutes or so after he had gained his point of observation, he heard the creaking of a door, and from the postern in the inner barbican he beheld the gleam of another lantern. It advanced swiftly toward him—for a pathway ran beside the larches—and presently there came the sound of feet. Soon Pantaleone could discern the figure of a man faintly outlined against the all-pervading gloom.

Immovable he stood screened by the larches, unseen yet observing. The figure advanced; it passed so closely by him that by putting forth his arm he might have touched it. He recognized the livid, pockmarked face of the castellan, and he noted that the fellow carried a basket slung on the crook of his left arm. He caught the faint gleam of napery atop of it, and thrusting forth from this the neck of a wine-flask.

The man passed on, and reached the wall. A green door was set in it just thereabouts, and Pantaleone was prepared to see him vanish through, preparing, indeed, to follow. Instead, however, Mario paused at the wall's foot some ten paces away from that door, and Pantaleone caught the sound of hands softly clapped and a voice softly calling:

"Are you there, Colomba?"

Instantly from beyond the wall floated the answer in a woman's voice:

"I am here."

What followed was none so distinct, and asked for guesswork on Pantaleone's part. Partly he saw and partly inferred that Mario had taken a ladder that lay at the wall's foot, set it against the wall, mounted it, and from the summit slung down his basket to his wife within the enclosure.

That was all. The thing being done, Mario descended again, removed the ladder, and returned unencumbered now and moving swiftly.

Pantaleone found his every suspicion confirmed. As he had supposed, Colomba and the groom Giuberti were ministering to the concealed Matteo Orsini, whose food was borne to him thus in the night by Mario—and no doubt in the raw, to be cooked and prepared by Mario's wife—so that none in Pievano should share the secret with those who already and perforce were in possession of it.

All this was clear as daylight. But on the other hand, something was happening that suddenly drew his attention to himself and his own position. Mario, instead of returning to the house, had paused midway a moment, as if hesitating, and then had struck across the gardens toward the light that marked the spot where Raffaele hunted.

Now this to Messer Pantaleone was a serious matter. It might, unless he were careful, lead to the discovery of his own real pursuits. He came forth from his concealment and very softly set himself to follow Mario. Thus as far as the second terrace. Then, as Mario still went on upward, Pantaleone turned quickly away to the right, thus returning to the very spot where he had extinguished his lantern. Arrived there, he turned and came running back shouting as he ran:

"Raffaele! Raffaele!"

He saw the swinging lantern of Mario arrested in its progress, and a moment later farther along the upper terrace gleamed Raffaele's light, as the boy approached the edge in answer to that summons.

"I have found it!" cried Pantaleone, as indeed he had found it—in his pocket where it had been safely bestowed.

He advanced to the foot of the flight of steps that led upward, and there awaited them.

"You have found it?" quoth Raffaele crestfallen.

Pantaleone dangled it aloft by the chain.

"Behold!" he said, and added—"but you shall have a ducat for your pains, none the less. So comfort you."

"Did you find it in the dark?" It was Mario's voice that growled the question, and Pantaleone was quick to catch the note of suspicion running through it.

"Fool," he answered, preferring to take him literally. "How could I have found it in the dark? I upset my lantern in my excitement."

Mario was scanning his face closely.

"It is very odd," said he, "that as I came this way I saw no light."

"I was beyond the hedge yonder. That may have screened it," Pantaleone explained, and added no word more, for he knew that who explains himself too much accuses himself.

They trooped back to the house together; Raffaele silenced by his disappointment. Mario thoughtful and suspicious of all this ado; Pantaleone babbling naively in his delight at the recovery of his precious amulet, and recounting the circumstances under which his mother had set it round his neck, with what words she had enjoined him to keep it safe, and against what dreadful perils it had been his shield—all lies that came bubbling from his fertile mind like water from a spring.

But despite all this, when at length he came to bid good night to Mario, he saw that clay-colored face grimly set in lines of mistrust.

He went thoughtfully to bed in consequence. He lay awake some time considering his discovery and considering still more deeply that part of it which left him mystified. At another time he might have delayed his action until he had cleared that up. But here he decided that to delay further might be dangerous. He told himself again that he had discovered all that mattered, and he fell asleep promising himself that upon the morrow he would act upon that discovery and lay Messer Matteo Orsini snugly by the heels.

Pantaleone at last shows himself in his true colors. But there's always a chance.

Famous Inscription

The book held in the left hand of the Statue of Liberty represents a "Book of Laws," which the sculptor, Bartholdi, says was to remind the incoming immigrants that without obedience to law there could be no true liberty. The inscription thereon reads: "July IV. MDCCCLXXVI." It was the intention of the French to present the gift upon the hundredth anniversary of our Independence. There was delay and disappointment, and the official presentation was not made until July 4, 1884, in Paris.

Be Lenient in Judging

Learn to make allowances for the old and young, the wise and illiterate, the wealthy and impoverished. Temper judgment with kindness; help instead of condemning. Many people never get out of the shadow. Penury pulls at their heartstrings and ill-health discolors their outlook.

The benefit of a charitable fellowship is that the man who gains it is wonderfully helped. Southey says: "He who is most charitable in his judgment is generally the least unjust." Things brighten for him and he remembers, when he sees another less favorably placed than himself, that place might easily have been filled by himself.

So long as a man is trying, though he may fall, he is worth help and tolerance, for such a man is doing his best.—London Tit-Bits.

FOR THE SAKE OF THE CHILD

By MERTON WHITE

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman.)

THE prisoner in cell 45 was fortunate, for he had an unobstructed view of what was called the finest view in the world—the great stretch of the river by moonlight, and the high buildings opposite, lit like a fairyland. But what are city views to a man who is serving a sentence of fifteen years?

Fifteen years! Dent's blood had run cold when the judge pronounced that inexorable verdict. And Dent was considered lucky! He had killed a man whom, in his insane jealousy, he supposed to have betrayed his young wife. Before he went to the penitentiary he knew that Lucille had forgotten him. Later he learned of the child's coming.

Fifteen years! He had watched Lucille's face that last time they met, and in the forgiveness he had seen no love. He had killed that forever. When he learned that she was seeking a divorce he bowed to the inevitable. Fifteen years means the best part of a man's life, at any time.

Then he learned of her divorce, later news came of her remarriage. They ceased to correspond, of course, and all the convict's hopes of life shrank to that spot of future freedom, unbelievably small and distant. There were twelve long years still to be served. And he seemed to have lived through a life's agony already.

Dent looked down through the slit of a window. It was just wide enough to admit the passage of a man's body—if any man was willing to risk a leap of 70 feet into the flood-tide of the river below. Dent occupied that cell temporarily. It was the quarantine cell, but there was an overflow of prisoners in the cells underneath, and he was trusted—trusted not to commit suicide! He smiled.

The rusty bars were more a pretense than anything else. Dent had worked them loose from the masonry. He had resolved that night to make the leap—not for freedom but for eternal sleep, under the waves.

He looked up and down the river. A steamer from the coast was putting into port. Dent could see her in the distance, her brilliantly lit windows looking like eyes. He saw, too, that she was belching smoke from her funnels, as if burning soft coal. But he did not think long about that. The river below was tempting in its promise of peace.

Dent removed the bars one by one and flung them upon the floor of the cell. He wanted to finish the leap quickly, for his mind was full of unhappy thoughts. What sort of man had Lucille married? Was he good to her? Did he care for the child whom he had never seen? It was well that very soon no thoughts like that would come to trouble him.

He squeezed his body upon the narrow ledge and crouched there, measuring the distance. Even now the instincts of the old diver came to him. He knew that, with the proper poise, he could make the plunge in safety and swim to freedom, to lurk along the docks until the sun dried his clothing—plain blue, such as the trusties wore.

And he did not want his freedom. He wanted death.

He leaped. He felt himself whirl through the air. And even then, against his will, automatically the habits of the diver reasserted themselves. He cleft the cool surface of the water easily, held his breath, swam under the waves, and emerged upon the surface.

He could not drown! He cursed himself bitterly. What should he do now?

The answer came automatically, for, not a hundred yards from him, the great steamer lay anchored, apparently—no, drifting on the tide. From her bridge poured a mass of sooty flame. She was on fire, and the wheel could not be held or reached.

He heard her sirens hoot fearfully. Then she seemed to keel over, and on the sloping deck stood tiny figures that shrieked for help and looked down in terror into the seas as the fire, gaining stronger hold, swept the vessel from end to end.

Boats were pushing out from both sides of the channel, but the flames were spreading with terrific speed. And suddenly Dent found that he was striking out, like a practiced swimmer, toward the blazing ship. Some instinct carried him there, for there was nothing he could do; and this accident meant his safety. Why, he could pass as a passenger!

The heat was almost intolerable upon his face. But, arm over arm, he fought his way onward until at last he found himself in the water, almost level with the deck's edge, while overhead the boats which could not be launched, writhed in the twisting flames.

On the other side of the deck, along the edge, which towered high above the waterline, the boats, half-lowered, had been broken against the side. A group of passengers was clustered there, making desperate efforts to launch the last boat that remained, while the smoke drifted and coiled about them.

Dent looked quickly across the water after he had scrambled aboard. The oncoming boats seemed immeasurably far away. There seemed no possibility that they could arrive before the sweeping fires engulfed the vessel. Men were already beginning to jump. Then Dent was aware of a woman and child that stood helplessly at the extreme edge of the boat. The woman was shielding the child's face from the flames and looking down wildly into the water.

As Dent neared them a fat man came bursting through the crowd. He snatched a lifebelt from a slighter man and began hurriedly to adjust it. The other turned upon him, grasped the lifebelt again, and began putting it upon the woman. The bully turned on him and knocked him senseless.

Dent grasped the belt out of his hand, and a wild fight began. The fat man, coward, though he was, fought like the devil for that once chance of life. He smashed Dent's face with his fists, but Dent, who had tossed the lifebelt to the woman, stood up to his antagonist until a sudden lurch of the ship threw the fat man from his feet and sent him sliding across the deck.

He entered the fiery hell. His screams rang out for an instant above the cries of the panic-stricken crowd. Then Dent turned to the woman.

"No!" he said, seing her fitting the belt about the baby. "I will take care of it. Save yourself! She is helpless without you!"

The woman tremblingly submitted, but it was not until Dent had fitted it about her that he knew he was speaking to Lucille.

She recognized him, too, with a cry. Dent looked at the unconscious man beside her.

"Your husband?" he asked grimly.

"No. He is dead. He died last year. That man is a stranger."

"He left you with money?"

"Steady," said Dent, placing his arm about her as she began to waver from indecision. She had gathered the child to her and poised herself for the spring. "Steady. There may be time to escape by boat before the fire reaches us. If not, jump, and I will jump with the child. It is mine?"

"Yes. She is called Mary. She—"

"She thinks your second husband was her father?"

Lucille nodded. "Listen!" she said, laying her hand on his sleeve, "I may as well tell you. That man is not a stranger. He cares for me. I refused him—I don't know why—I am not rich, though I have a little to live on. For the child's sake—"

"Yes, go on," said Dent, feeling immeasurably removed from it all, and watching her as if he were a spectator at a play.

"I can't come back to you," she cried. "I live among very decent people—"

"Don't worry about me," answered Dent quietly. "I only wanted to know that the baby would have opportunities in life—that she would be cared for. I am a jailbird. I am good for nothing. I have no intention of entering your life again—"

Even then he realized her heartlessness in that she never even glanced at the man on the deck beside her.

And suddenly a new thought came to Dent. He had wanted to die; now he wanted to live. The desire of life swept over him like a flood—like the fire that was sweeping toward them, fanning them with its hot breath. But the boats were very near.

"Jump!" he cried, and seized the child and leaped.

He heard the bubbling cry; but he was treading water now, and holding his little girl in his arms. A boat drew near. He reached up and placed her within. A few strokes carried the rowers to where Lucille floated, gasping, upon the surface.

"There's room for you," said the boatsman, when Lucille had been taken aboard.

Dent smiled grimly and swam away. He trod the water until he was assured that the stunned man had been saved. He saw the flotilla of boats about the ship picking up the passengers from the water. Then he struck out steadily toward the shore.

Life was before him—a new life, somewhere. He knew now all that he had ever wanted to know. Some day he would redeem himself—and some day, when she was grown, Mary should know him.

Forms of Play Seen as Educational Force

The causes of unrest are not economic but spiritual. What we are witnessing is the revolt of men who see life passing away without their ever having lived, who face the prospect of carrying their ideals and aspirations unfulfilled and unspoken to the grave, writes Joseph Lee, in World's Work.

Since play is the most deeply rooted instinct in human nature, the ideal is to have man's work satisfy his play instinct. But civilization upsets theory, sidesteps play abruptly at the point where the child became a man. There is no place in nine-tenths of industry and business for play.

Play is an educational force. In animals it is the urge to incarnate the instincts by which the species sustains life. The kitten chasing a leaf is incarnating itself as the future hunter. Man has more complex instincts to incarnate. Fundamentally play embodies three great necessities of existence: hunting, fighting and teamwork. Any "game" includes two or more of those elements in combination.

What we must aim at is to liberate the community urge to play, so that each individual finds satisfaction for his needs of hunting, fighting, teamwork, creation and understanding. Work—economic independence—is one condition of an individual's self respect and happiness, but only half of it; the man who has only work and no play has only half of him alive.

Silver Spring

IN CERTAIN sections of Florida there is an underground layer of limestone. Beneath this rock-sheet a number of rivers, of whose presence there is no surface indication, busily work their way toward the sea.

Breaks or other openings in this stratum of stone enable some of these streams to burst through and come to the surface, which they do with a suddenness that is astonishing, in the form of great fountains or springs—producing a strange spectacle as unusual in character as it is beautiful to behold.

Perhaps the most prominent of these springs is Silver spring—in Marion county, a few miles from the town of Ocala—the basin of which is several acres in extent.

The water contains sufficient lime to settle any substance which might be carried in solution and is so perfectly clear that the bottom—80 feet down in one place—is distinctly visible.

Seen in any light at any time of day or year, this great basin of bubbling, crystal-clear water is a fascinating sight. It is seen to best advantage, however, when a slight breeze whips the surface into a succession of dancing ripples and the sunshine illumines those ripples, investing them with all the colors of the rainbow. The sight thus produced is one of rare and enchanting beauty.

The overflow of this spring is carried off by a stream which flows into the Ocklawaha river—a tropical stream which meanders through tangled, vine-hung growths to join the greater St. Johns river.

Chicago's New Water Tunnel

THE completion of a new water tunnel under a portion of Chicago discloses some enlightening information concerning the tremendous size and amazing cost of such undertakings in large cities.

Constructed in order that some 600,000 persons residing in the southwestern part of the city might "drink copiosly and have more water for Saturday night," this tunnel is horseshoe in shape, lined with concrete to cover all jagged projections and remove all resistance to water flow, has a finished diameter of 12 feet, is 6 1-3 miles long—all in solid rock, and, in the main, 140 feet below the surface of the streets.

According to the city engineer, approximately 1,400,000 pounds of dynamite were used in blasting, 400,000 cars of rock excavated and elevated to the surface and 500,000 bags of cement used in lining the tunnel.

The work in the tunnel was carried on from two shafts—each plant, electrically operated, consisting of headhouse, power house, dry room, storeroom, office, blacksmith shop, cement shed, carpenter shop, rock crusher and storage bins.

The capacity of this tunnel is 300,000,000 gallons per twenty-four hours. The total cost, including the shafts and equipment, was about $131 per foot, or $4,500,000 all told.

The pumping station is equipped with four compound turbine-driven pumps, each with a capacity of 75,000,000 gallons per twenty-four hours, and cost an additional $2,500,000.

El Capitan

ASCENDING the rugged canyon of the Merced river to the lovely valley of the Yosemite in California one comes upon a colossal hunk of granite—plain, stern, challenging, and of such staggering proportions as to cause suspicion concerning the correctness of his vision.

This is El Capitan—the word a probable derivation or corruption of the Indian name "Tu-tock-ah-nu-lah"—said to be the largest, loftiest, mightiest, most glorious rock in creation.

The significance of this statement is apparent when one understands that the almost-perpendicular face of this stupendous pile rises 3,000 feet, or nearly three-quarters of a mile, toward the blue sky above from the water in the tiny river at its base, while its two side walls have an area of between three and four hundred acres.

Opinion differs concerning its origin. Great floods rushing down the valley for long periods when the Sierra Nevada mountains were in the making may have scoured away the dirt and debris and left this immovable rock. Again, a glacier of untold size and age may have ground its way down this valley, destroying everything in its path save this indestructible giant. Or the bottom of the valley may have been sunk by an earthquake.

The impression which this monster rock makes upon one varies with the moods of the weather. A pale moonlight gives to it an almost ghostly outline of overwhelming immensity with a somewhat spooky personality.

Defoe and Wells

Some one recently observed that Daniel Defoe, best known as the author of "Robinson Crusoe," was the H. G. Wells of his day, from the standpoint of prolific writing. He is said to have no less than 250 books and tracts to his credit.

Quart of Water Cleans Kidneys

Take a Little Salts if Your Back Hurts, or Bladder is Troubling You

No man or woman can make a mistake by flushing the kidneys occasionally, says a well-known authority. Eating too much rich food creates acids, which excite the kidneys. They become overworked from the strain, get sluggish and fail to filter the waste and poisons from the blood. Then we get sick. Rheumatism, headaches, liver trouble, nervousness, dizziness, sleeplessness and urinary disorders often come from sluggish kidneys.

The moment you feel a dull ache in the kidneys, or your back hurts, or if the urine is cloudy, offensive, full of sediment, irregular of passage or attended by a sensation of scalding, begin drinking a quart of water each day, also get about four ounces of Jad Salts from any pharmacy; take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast and in a few days your kidneys may act fine.

This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to flush and stimulate the kidneys; also to help neutralize the acids in the system, so they no longer cause irritation, thus often relieving bladder weakness.

Jad Salts is inexpensive; makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink which everyone should take now and then to help keep the kidneys clean and active and the blood pure, thereby often avoiding serious kidney complications.

ALLAYS FEAR OF QUAKE INCREASE

Director of Georgetown "U" Replies to Inquirers

Washington.—The earth is not shaking any more than it used to, but people are noticing it more.

This is the answer of Director Tondorf of the Georgetown university observatory to the flood of inquiries reaching him as to whether earthquakes are increasing in number and frequency.

Because of the precision of instruments which record tremors, the public is informed constantly through their newspapers of disturbances of the earth's crust in all parts of the globe. The lay belief that the shocks are becoming close together is a result of this publicity.

"The layman, unofficially interested in the restlessness of the earth's crust, should know the truth," says Doctor Tondorf. "The problem of computing earthquake frequency was first scientifically undertaken by Count de Montessus de Ballore, one-time director of the seismological observatory of the government of Chile.

In 1900, after a close analysis of the then available earthquake records, 131,292 in number, he placed the annual average earthquake occurrence at 3,830, equivalent to an ear shock every two hours and twenty-seven minutes.

Four years afterward Dr. August Sieberg of the University of Jena questioned the estimate as too low. A recalculation made by him in 1923 lifted the annual average frequency to 9,000, or about one every hour.

Five thousand of these quakes he indicated as being felt sensibly on some part of the earth's surface in varying intensities. Violent quakes, classified by others as world-shaking, occur at intervals of every three and one-half days, either on the continents or on the ocean's bottom. Those on land, however, average every fifth day.

"California, the least immune of all United States territory, is visited by a shock on an average of 81 times annually. The liability of one of these shocks being heavy is about eight-tenths of 1 per cent."

"Rent Party" Staves Off Collector in Harlem

New York.—Two novel easy-money schemes have grown up in Harlem, haven of the negro in New York.

The "rent party" is the most unique. When the visit of the rent collector is imminent and the family treasury is low, comes the happy thought of turning the living quarters into an impromptu place of entertainment for a night. The box office is the sidewalk, where tickets to the "rent party" are sold to whomever among the passers-by can be importuned into the home. The price of admission is 25 cents upward, according to the "swankiness" of the household.

The motley room of guests occasionally get boisterous, leading the revelers into the toils of the law.

The other scheme, in which the rewards are uncertain except for the promoters, is a sort of lottery, known as "numbers" or the "policy game," operated with the daily figures of total stock market sales as a basis. Although contributions of as little as a nickle are solicited, considerable sums are involved.

Burglar Discusses Art as He Takes Jewelry

New York.—A burglar with a penchant for discussing art with his victims, if they happen to meet him, robbed Mrs. Adelaide O'Donohue of Brooklyn of $15,000 in jewels. Mrs. O'Donohue, police said in revealing the burglary, was awakened by a flashlight in her face just before daybreak and called out, "Who are you?"

"I'm a burglar," was the reply. "I want your money and your jewelry."

She told them they were in the bureau, but he paused to remark:

"That's a corking fine painting you have there. Is it genuine?"

Mrs. O'Donohue assured him it was and that it was called "Out of Chaos Comes the Dawn." The thief, glancing out of the window, remarked that sure enough it was dawning. He then went to the bureau and selected gems, conversing the while.

The burglar remarked upon volumes of Byron, Shelley and Keats on a table.

'Sleeping-Car Sirens' Bilk American Tourists

London.—Sleeping-car sirens are a menace to travelers in some parts of Europe. Wealthy Americans are said to be frequently their victims.

Good looks, beautiful clothes, a mixture of tears and coquetry, a card case containing names of famous persons of Europe and a tearful tale of a lost purse or railway ticket enable these adventuresses to extract large sums of money from male travelers.

Yugo-Slav police recently arrested a young woman of twenty-four who for the last three years has been levying toll from wealthy travelers on the famous Simplon Express, which rushes across the continent from Paris to Constantinople.

37,000 TONS ADDED TO EARTH YEARLY

French Scientist Says Shooting Stars Not Dangerous.

Paris.—In a recent article in Le Petit Journal, Abbe Th. Moreaux, director of the Observatory of Bruges, discussed the annual fall visitation of shooting stars, particularly noticeable in France. He said:

"Every year readers of Le Petit Journal write to me about the appearance in the sky of luminous meteors which sometimes burst in the air and light up the landscape. When these stones reach the earth they constitute what scientists call aerolites. Their metallic character is now well recognized and there are many varieties of them to be seen in the beautiful collection of the Paris Museum of Natural History.

"Astronomers still discuss their origin, but all admit that the aerolites are the remnants of comets. Between the shooting stars, which weigh hardly a centigram, and the aerolites, which may weigh several tons, there would be perfect identity, if they were of the same weight.

Dangers Are Exaggerated.

"Formerly people attributed to these bodies all sorts of terrors. But today we possess better information about them and are in a position to say that the dangers from a fall of meteors are greatly exaggerated.

"Ought we to fear a general bombardment? I don't think so. The interplanetary spaces are being emptied more and more of the materials which contributed to the formation of the sun and the planets, and there is no reason in nature to foresee a terrifying recurrence of meteors. Undoubtedly certain years, like 1908, 1914 and 1926, show incontestable maxima. But year in and year out our planet receives on an average only 37,000 tons of foreign material.

"That is very little compared with the total mass of the globe—so little that at such a rate it would take 400,000,000 years to accumulate a layer one centimeter thick over the entire surface of the earth.

"At this rate the length of the day would be increased hardly a thousandth of a second in a million years. We have plenty of time to see what will happen, and the aerolites will hardly derange our sidereal clocks.

"Every year we notice, also, a return of warmth with St. Martin's summer, which arrives in November, and some subtle scientists have concluded that this phenomenon of warming up should be attributed to the big swarm of shooting stars, known under the name of Leonides, through which the earth passes at this period.

Heat Theory Is Denied.

"Here is an admirable piece of foolishness which will be passed out again this year if the autumn continues to be normal.

"Let us suppose, however, that at the moment of the November shower there falls on the earth one hundred tons of meteors every day, which is a very high maximum. Do you know what amount of heat that would develop at the end of a year for each square meter of the earth's surface? Exactly what the sun sends us in a tenth of a second. You see that a little figuring often prevents people from saying foolish things.

"But there is another consideration. If our dog days during St. Martin's summer were due to encountering meteor swarms, the phenomenon would occur everywhere on the globe. Now, all experienced meteorologists will tell you that St. Martin's summer is limited to certain countries and is not encountered everywhere on the earth's surface.

"The question is thus pretty well cleared up. Apart from being struck on the head by a meteor, which is an extremely rare occurrence, we can reassure ourselves as to the future which the shooting stars and the aerolites have in store for our planet."

Air-Mail Pilots Earn as High as $9,000 Yearly

Washington.—The lure of flying holds its monetary reward, at least for the air-mail pilot.

The aviator postman receives an annual salary of between $4,000 and $9,000. The high pay, plus the desire for the excitement of flying, recently caused two field superintendents of the service to desert ground jobs and return to piloting. Both now fly regular mail routes.

The mail pilot receives a base pay of between $2,000 and $3,000, depending on length of service, and is paid in addition by the mile for flying service.

For daylight flying, he receives a 5-cent rate between Cleveland and Cheyenne, 6 cents between Cheyenne and Reno, and 7 cents between New York and Cleveland, and between Reno and San Francisco. For night flying the mileage scale is doubled.

The hazards of mail piloting are held by postal officials to justify the pay.

Begging Pays

Philadelphia.—A wheel-chair beggar has been found to have a bank account of $15,000, an automobile and real estate, and to be paying $4 a day at a hotel.

BARE ATTEMPT TO ROB QUEEN MARIE

Police Get Man Believed to Have Sought Gems.

New York.—An attempt to rob Queen Marie was disclosed by police detectives.

A man who claims to be a professional tea taster, but who is accused by police of having attempted to steal gems from the Rumanian queen when she was visiting here, was arrested for the robbery of nearly $2,200 in jewels from Samuel Frothingham.

He gave his name as John Alderson and his age as twenty-seven. Apparently he is well educated, and police describe him as a "gentleman burglar" of the Raffles type. He was arrested as he was leaving the area way of a building in the fashionable section of the upper East side, where Frothingham has an apartment on the ground floor.

Police list a $1,500 bracelet, set with 50 diamonds, a diamond ring, a gold cigarette case, gold match case, and a gold bar pin as having been recovered from him. They claim he has a police record in England as well as this country.

Detectives said that when Queen Marie was visiting the United States Alderson attempted to enter the home of a family she visited for the purpose of stealing the royal jewels, but was prevented by the heavy guard assigned to her protection.

The neighborhood in which he was captured has been under observation for some time because of burglaries in the vicinity and from fashionable clubs and hotels farther downtown. Police claim that a man of Alderson's appearance recently followed a member of the family of John D. Rockefeller, Jr., into a Fifth avenue restaurant, apparently lured by a display of gems, but got nothing.

Police allege that Alderson often displays a preference for antiques.

Buffaloes in Canadian Park Show Big Increase

Edmonton, Alta.—Buffalo in the government herd at Wainwright Park, Alta., have increased from 709 to 12,000 head since 1907, according to a report issued by J. B. Harkin, commissioner of Canadian national parks.

"Nineteen years ago bison were practically extinct in North America," says Mr. Harkin's report. "Of countless millions that roamed the plains in pioneer days, only a few hundred remained. These were in the hands of Michael Pablo, half-breed Indian of Montana, who sold his herd to the Canadian government when the buffalo preserve at Wainwright was established in 1907.

"Future of the buffalo is now assured. The herd is increasing at the rate of 1,500 head a year. Shortage of pasture near the park, due to the rapid development of farming, has made it necessary to ship 4,000 young bison north to the wild buffalo preserve on Slave river in the last two years. Wainwright park can normally support 8,000 of these animals.

"From time to time a number of these bison are slaughtered and commercial utilization made of the meat and hides. Flesh of a young well-nourished buffalo is considered by gourmets better flavored than beef. Buffalo hide makes excellent leather for shoes, golf bags, and articles requiring strength and flexibility."

French Protest Bread for Dogs

Paris.—The dogs of France daily eat 3,000 tons of bread. The few Frenchmen who are not devoted to dogs are protesting against these "mouths without hands maintained at vast expense" while 5,000,000 small investors, pensioners and underpaid employees, victims of the depreciated franc, go underfed. Dogs, they declare, can be fed on other things than bread.

Own Domestic Affairs Baffle Puzzle Expert

London.—Alfred Harry Mutton used to be butler at Hanover square, in which fashionable quarter his wife exercised her talents as a cook. With the changing times, however, a change came in the Muttons' scheme of life. The ex-butler developed recently into a "competition solutionist"—a profession the pursuit of which resulted in a serious rift in the formerly well ordered Mutton household.

When Mr. Justice Hill, before whom the Muttons appeared to thrash out their difficulties, inquired what a "competition solutionist" might be, Mr. Mutton explained that he solved crossword puzzles and other newspaper prize puzzles for the benefit of a large circle of paying clients.

"I win prizes for other people," stated the competition solutionist, perhaps with a mean look in the direction of the errant Mrs. Mutton.

Pity the Intelligentsia!

President Sumner of Talladega college said in Talladega the other day: "The intelligentsia all over the world—the college professors and ministers and poets and scientists—are having a hard time of it. Between capital on the one side and labor on the other they are being pretty badly flattened out. The way they have to economize!

"I heard of a young college professor last month who, after he'd been accepted by a pretty girl, slipped on her finger a combination engagement, wedding and teething ring."

When Winter Comes
Good Elimination Is Essential

HABITS of life change with the changing seasons. Winter brings us more indoors; we are apt to get less fresh air and exercise, to eat heavier food and to be less active generally. These winter-time habits impose heavier burdens upon our hard-working kidneys.

Sluggish kidney function permits retention of poisonous waste in the blood and makes one an easier victim of winter's colds and chills. Presence of these unfiltered toxins makes itself felt in many unpleasant ways. One is apt to feel tired, achy and listless — to have drowsy headaches, dizziness and perhaps a dull, "toxic" backache. That the kidneys are not functioning as they should is often shown by scanty or burning secretions.

At such times the use of a stimulant diuretic* to the kidneys is indicated. Doan's Pills act on the kidneys only. Grateful users the country over recommend them. Ask your neighbor!

*Diuretics are agents which increase the secretion of the kidneys—Encyclopaedia definition.

Thin Cream

Thin cream causes an unnecessary loss of skim-milk. It has a poor keeping quality. It costs the creamery more to handle and churn thin cream than it does richer cream.

Cream testing from 35 per cent to 40 per cent in the summer time and 30 per cent to 35 per cent in the winter is best for both producer and creamery. A Land O' Lakes cream should test at least 25 per cent. This is the official standard, and it is our wish that our patrons check up on their test and see if their test complies with the rules.

The Better Seed Special Train is a traveling Farmers' Institute to give the farmers of Minnesota the new information available as to new crop varieties, plant diseases, and new seed-cleaning machinery, and to encourage the use of high quality seed in order that better crops of grains, corn, grasses, and potatoes may be grown more economically. It is being operated jointly by the Soo, the Northern Pacific, and the Great Northern railroads, and is manned by a staff of good speakers from the Minnesota College of Agriculture, the United States Departmen of Agriculture, and Junior clubs.

Two cars of exhibits are a feature of the train.

Jesse Sorum came up Friday from Crookston for a short visit with relatives, returning home on the afternoon train.

SCHOOL NOTES

The English I class have been reading a novel which they will have to make a report on within three weeks. They will also have to read some poetry, two short-stories, and a play. This is a state requirement.

As this is the last week of the third six weeks' period, all the high school pupils are busy reviewing for their examinations.

Mr. Vieths—"What is a folded mountain, Mabel?"

Mabel—"A folded mountain is a rolling mountain."

The First grade have studied the Eskimo, and also an Eskimo song.

The Second grade have a spelling chart, and each child has an individual graph which indicates his mark for every lesson.

The first graders have been bringing books from home to read at the library table.

The eighth grade civics class are beginning the study of the Declaration of Independence. This topic was first taken up by reviewing some of the charters, the Bills of Right, and the Petitions of Right of England. The Magna Charta of England was studied fully and will be compared with our own Declaration.

In the spelling contest between the "Blues" and the "Reds," the "Blues" were the first to lodge San Francisco, as they were 800 miles ahead of the "Reds." More luck to the "Reds" next time.

The seventh grade geography class has begun to draw maps of South America. The first maps were rather crude, but by practice they are shaving off the crudity, so their present productions are presentable.

A shipment of science equipment was added to our laboratory last week. This will be used immediately by the biology class.

Visit our school.

Babcock Made Head of Road-Builders Assn.

Election as President of American Association is Recognition of the State's Road Work

Minnesota was honored by the election of its highway commissioner, C. M. Babcock, as president of the American Road Builders' association at its annual meeting at Chicago last week. Mr. Babcock was the only nominee for the office. The election is a recognition of the road building progress made in Minnesota during the last decade.

The American Road Builders association is composed of federal, state, county and municipal highway officials, highway engineers, contractors and machinery manufacturers. It is the largest organization of road builders in the world, and the annual meeting is the clearing house for all the latest information on improved road building methods and road progress. The meeting was attended by delegates from every state in the Union and from several South American republics and European nations.

Mr. Babcock was formerly the president of the American Association of State Highway Officials. This organization is also national in scope but more limited in membership.

Raymond Wegge arrived here Wednesday from Larimore, N. D. to visit at the home of his parents, Mr. and Mrs. L. Wegge.

SCIENCE IS USED TO BARE CRIME

Novel Apparatus Registers Guilty Excitement.

New York.—Using specially devised apparatus to measure the electrical resistance of the human skin and an electrical stethoscope which enabled the audience to hear the thumping of the heart of the person under examination, Dr. A. P. Link, instructor in psychology at New York university, demonstrated to the New York Electrical society how science can aid in detecting and apprehending criminals.

Three persons selected from the audience were sent out of the room under sealed instructions. One of the trio chosen by lot went to a room on the tenth floor of the building where a letter was taken out of an overcoat pocket.

From the envelope $10 was removed, the letter was replaced and the "culprit," whose identity was not disclosed to Doctor Link or those in the audience, returned to the auditorium.

Doctor Link then subjected each of the three to electrical psychology tests. The emotions aroused by the guilt of the "robber" became instantly evident on the records of the apparatus.

An electrical stethoscope, specially devised by the Bell Telephone laboratories, amplifying the heart-beat sounds more than 100,000 times, enabled the audience to hear the thumping of the heart. When the young man who had opened the envelope and removed the $10 was asked questions bearing on the "robbery" his quickened thumping of heart when the key words were mentioned was instantly made evident.

In addition to the quickened heart beat of the one who removed the $10 from the envelope, "guilty excitement" was also demonstrated in the form of a moving spot of light thrown on a screen in full view of the audience. The spot shot clear across the screen when the person questioned became unduly excited.

Doctor Link explained that excitement lowered the electrical resistance of the skin. This, he said, was especially when an effort was made to lie or to conceal the truth.

According to Doctor Link this reaction is entirely outside the control of the person examined. He said this apparatus was "a complete give-away of the emotions which the robber was attempting to conceal." Doctor Link also explained a number of psychological tests, electrical and otherwise, now in use for the selection of employees, either for hire or promotion. He said these tests must not be used as infallible guides, but as an aid to the general common sense.

Ample Coal in Colombia for World 500 Years

Chicago.—When American coal supplies are exhausted, the world may look to the republic of Colombia for fuel, Dr. Alberto Benavides, consul of Colombia, said here, in planning for the welcome in Colombia to be extended the Illinois manufacturers and merchants who visit his country in February.

"Colombia," Doctor Benavides said, "has enough coal to furnish the world its supply for the next five centuries."

Leaving Chicago, February 1, a group of 78 Illinois manufacturers and merchants will take a Caribbean sea cruise for trade promotion purposes, touching two ports in the republic of Colombia—Barranquilla and Puerto Colombia.

"This treasure land of promise," Doctor Benavides said, "is nearer to the United States than any other South American country.

"Gold is found in almost a free state in every river of the republic. Every mineral known to mankind is found in Colombia in abundance. There is one port where the platinum of the world is produced."

Worth It

New York.—John M. Reiss, a nephew, has been awarded a fortune that requires three hours to count. It consists of $4,481.80 in pennies, nickels, dimes and quarters, found in the room of Mrs. Tillie Reiss.

Section Hand Heads $2,000,000 Business

Marysville, Kans.—From railroad section employee to control of a $2,000,000 manufacturing corporation in a few days has been the accomplishment of James W. Reynolds of this city.

Reynolds obtained a layoff last month from his job with the Union Pacific railroad here, and a few days ago a corporation to manufacture a railway spike of which he and two associates have control was organized in Chicago. The concern is the Superior Spike company.

About the time of the World war Reynolds invented a boltless rail point. He was without capital to market his invention. One day on the right of way he found a paper which contained the name of C. E. Ennis, Rincon, N. M., roadmaster for the Santa Fe railroad, who at that time was president of a switch manufacturing company with headquarters at Kansas City.

They became acquainted and a partnership was formed to introduce the boltless rail joint.

HOME OF CHARLIE ROSS IS WRECKED

Recalls Famous Kidnaping Case of 1874.

Philadelphia.—Bowing to time, showing signs of age in its vacant windows, and its moss covered, drooping verandas, a bleak, weather-beaten house, perhaps the most interesting structure in Philadelphia except Independence hall, today is crumbling under the blows of the pickax and the wrench of the crowbar.

This stolid three-story dwelling, of "the cupola era," rising on its high knoll above one of the declivities of Washington lane, in Germantown, once sheltered Charlie Ross, the boy whose disappearance has remained one of the mysteries of America and whose name through a half century was carried in hope, anxiety and despair to all corners of the earth.

Now it is being torn down to make room for the progress of a new generation which remembers little of the tragedy which came to the occupants of this house.

Mansion Became Church.

The Ross mansion, for the last decade, has been the seat of the Cliveden Presbyterian church. With the growth of the congregation it was found inadequate and a new church has been erected to the rear of the house. Now the house itself is being razed and on its site another church is to be built.

In the disappearance of the Ross home, Philadelphia loses one of its greatest shrines of the curious. From every section of the country have come visitors to gaze in awe at the old stone dwelling which has stood throughout the years a mute reminder of the tragic search for the lost boy.

More than fifty-two years have passed since that July day in 1874 when golden-haired Charlie, four-year-old son of Christian K. Ross, disappeared. The boy was playing on the lawn of his father's estate when he was enticed away by two men believed to have been responsible for his death. William Mosher and an accomplice drove up to the estate in a spring wagon and with promises of candy and a ride lured Charlie and his elder brother, Walter, into the wagon.

The four drove off and at the corner drug store some distance away Walter was given 25 cents to buy candy. When he returned with his purchases, the wagon, the two men and his little brother had disappeared. Charlie was never seen again by his family.

Until his death 23 years later, Christian Ross, the father, spent his life and fortune in an unsuccessful world-wide search for his boy, but no definite word was ever received concerning him.

Several times messages emanated from Mosher, promising Charlie's return if a large ransom were paid, but nothing came of the desperate father's attempts to comply with these requests.

Finally, without betraying the secret of Charlie's fate, Mosher and his comrade were killed in another city during an unsuccessful burglary.

Stories of Boy Plentiful.

Rumors of all sorts spread over the country as to the fate of Charlie Ross. Some say he was killed by Mosher or died while held a captive. Others were of the opinion that he is alive and from time to time claimants to his name have appeared.

Shortly after the old Ross home was sold to the Cliveden church, Mrs. Ross died, on December 13, 1912. Walter Ross, Charlie's brother, and his sister, Miss Sophia L. Ross, survive and are living near Philadelphia.

Only the old, weather-beaten house has remained, the solitary reminder to curious visitors of the most famous kidnaping case of the last century. That now is crumbling to dust, and Charlie Ross, fading out as a memory, is crystallizing as a tradition.

Bureau Makes Record in Measurement of Time

Washington.—The measurement of time to an accuracy of from one to two hundred thousandths of a thousand has been effected by the bureau of standards.

The measurement is ten times as fine as obtained by any previous method, bureau experts said. In physics research the measurement is believed to be of great value, as it is estimated that light travels nearly two miles in one hundred thousandth of a second.

A tuning fork, a pendulum swinging in a vacuum, a photoelectric cell, an oscillograph or tiny mirror mounted on two wires in a strong magnetic field, and a high speed camera constituted the measuring apparatus.

PUPILS' HONESTY IS PUT TO TEST

Rich Children More Prone to Steal Than Poor.

New York.—Studies of honesty among school children in cities and towns of the East indicate that children of wealth are most prone to steal money, that girls more often cheat in the class room and boys in games, and that honesty is in direct proportion to intelligence.

The tests are being made by psychologists engaged in a "character education inquiry" at the Columbia university.

A majority of the pupils were reported as lying, when asked questions to which they felt an affirmative answer should be given. For instance, to "do you read the Bible every day?" Ninety per cent said they did, according to Dr. Mark A. May, one of the psychologists.

Doctor May is on a three-year leave of absence from the Syracuse university faculty.

Ingenious tests were devised to measure such abstract quantities as stealing, lying and cheating tendencies. Children were asked to solve a puzzle which involved the use of 69 cents in various coins. The object was to see how many would take the money.

Among the 250 Jewish orphans of New York's East side only ten dimes disappeared. When the same test was given to children of the rich in an exclusive school it was found 18 per cent took money, while in one case the coins disappeared, box and all, and in another a pupil hid a 25-cent piece claimed an error and asked for a second, which also disappeared.

Girl Spurns Cinderella Role to Remain Servant

Phoenix, Ariz.—Jackie Henley, nineteen-year-old Denver girl, would rather continue as a servant than play a Cinderella role as the adopted daughter of J. M. Freeman, wealthy retired stock broker of Phoenix.

When Freeman was told that newspaper stories of his proposal to adopt the girl had caused probation officers to criticize Judge Ben Lindsey of the Denver Juvenile court for making the case public, he said he had abandoned his plan because of protests from her mother.

"I answered the girl's advertisement in a Denver newspaper," said Freeman, "and she came to Colorado Springs to see me, accompanied by her married sister. I explained that I needed a companion who wanted and needed a good home, and who would be willing to take care of me in my illness."

Judge Lindsey after talking to the girl, found that she preferred "a life as a domestic in Denver rather than be the pampered adopted daughter of an aged wealthy man."

Heavyweight Mayor of Tokyo Is Fencer

Tokyo.—Tokyo's new mayor, Hiromichi Nishikubo, is one of the most renowned fencers in Japan, despite his 238 pounds of weight.

Nishikubo, who was elected to succeed Mayor Izawa when the latter resigned because of ill health, is called by the Japanese the "Mussolini of Japan," as he is said to be, temperamentally, much like the Italian duce.

For years, Nishikubo, who is sixty-three years old, has been a master of the sword. When Marquis Okuma came into power 11 years ago, he appointed Nishikubo as chief of the metropolitan police board.

Award Woman Rail Clerk Bravery Medal

Philadelphia.—The directors of the Pennsylvania railroad awarded heroic service medals to eight employees in recognition of extraordinary acts of heroism and valor beyond the regular line of duty. President W. W. Atterbury presented the medals.

Miss Edna B. Drake, clerk in the Pendleton shops, Cincinnati, Ohio, was the first woman to be awarded the medal. She rescued a man from serious injury and possible death when he attempted to cross the railroad tracks in front of an approaching passenger train.

Supposed Grail Chalice on Exhibit in Britain

Manchester, England.—A glass cup of the First century, which it is thought might have been one of the four believed to have been used by Christ at the Last Supper, will be placed on exhibition at the Rylands library.

Much secrecy about the cup's Biblical significance is being maintained by Dr. James Rendel Harris, the noted scholar, who now possesses it. It is hoped the cup will throw additional light on certain portions of the gospel text. The cup was discovered in Crimea by a German archeologist who was an associate of Doctor Diessmann, the famous New Testament exegetist of Berlin university.

The cup, broken in transit to England, has been mended. It is golden yellow and was made in a clay mold, probably in the glass factory of Sidon. It is four and one-half inches high and bears an inscription in Greek.

IT WAS THE PROFESSOR'S SCHEME

By FENTON BRIGHT

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman.)

"WHY don't I go to work, boss? Because there ain't no human being what will give me work. You wouldn't believe me if I was to tell you that I'm a Yale graduate, and that my folks was as white as the driven snow, would you? Say, make it a dollar and I'll tell you my story.

"Thanks, boss. Well, then, my name's Theodore Van Trump, and I belong to one of the best families of Boston. And when I fell into love with Marian Richards there wasn't a happier man this side of the Common. The only fly in the ointment was Jim Burley, my rival. He wasn't a college man like me, but he had the rocks, and I hadn't.

"She couldn't decide which one of us she'd take. 'I love you both,' she said. 'I love you both equal. If I've got to decide I'll die an old maid. Can't one of you boys make me take you?'

"'That suits me,' says Jim. 'Same here,' I allowed. 'But how are we going to do it?' asks Jim. 'Let's fight for it,' says I. 'Right,' answers Jim, and we set to that night.

"It was a closed and locked empty room, and the key was put on the floor before the door, and the one that first grabbed it meant 'I've had enough.' A sanguinary battle it was, gentlemen. We fought thirty-seven rounds by daylight and eighteen more by candlelight. And when it was over neither of us would have recognized the other. But neither of us grabbed the key.

"'I guess that won't do,' panted Jim, as he looked at me out of the corner of his mouth from the floor. 'Same here,' I answered, out of my forehead. You see our features had become displaced, gentlemen. 'Let's grab the key together,' Jim suggests. 'That suits me,' I answered. And so we did.

"Jim challenged me to a duel. We went into the woods and shot at each other at ten paces, then five, then three. We drilled each other like sieves, but we couldn't kill each other. 'This won't do, either,' says Jim to me as we lay side by side in the hospital ward. 'I agree,' says I. Make it another dollar, gentlemen? No? All right, suit yourselves, then.

"Well, sir, we tried all ways, including going up in bursting balloons and eloping with Marian. Neither of us could bring it off. When Jim had Marian half way to the altar I butted in and forbade the banns. When I got Marian down a rope ladder, Jim was waiting below with an ax to chop the rope before I reached the ground. And all the time Marian would have taken either of us; didn't care which, in fact, so long as it wasn't anybody else.

"Jim comes to me one day. 'I got it,' he says. 'Got what?' asks I. 'It,' says Jim, displaying a vial. 'This was given to me by Professor MacStart,' he says, 'and it's going to solve our problem. Let's go to Marian's house and we'll all talk it over together.'

"When we got there Marian welcomed us like kings. 'Have you decided which of you it's to be?' she asks. 'I'm sort of getting tired of waiting, and it's only fair to tell you that there's a third party just butted in. Not that I care for him as I do you boys, but I can't wait for you forever.'

"'That's all right,' says Jim. 'My friend Perfessor MacStart has agreed to help us out of our difficulties. It's a duel,' he says.

"'Not for me,' says I. 'I've fought you enough duels, Jim, and you know we're so evenly matched that neither of us could best the other, not even in a spelling bee.'

"'This is different,' says Jim. 'I have here a vial. It contains two doses of stuff. Inside one of these doses is a single drop of Perfessor MacStart's famous mixture for turning white people black.'

"'I never heard of such a thing,' says Marian. 'Who wants to turn white people black?'

"'That's just the point; nobody does usually,' says Jim. 'However, this is a case in point. This single drop of Perfessor MacStart's famous mixture won't mix. It's just a drop, floating in the center of the bottle. It can't be seen, heard, smelled, touched, or tasted. Now, if we divide the contents of this here vial, one of us must get the drop and one won't. It can't be divided. It's an original molecoddleole.'

"'I'm beginning to get you now,' says I. 'The winner is the one what turns black, and he gets Miss Marian.'

"'Never!' screamed Marian. 'I'm going to marry the loser. No black fellows for mine.'

"'The winner is the loser,' explains Jim Burley. 'In six to eight hours the winning loser, what was white, turns completely black, for keeps. The loser is the winner. He marries Miss Marian.'

"'Not before I've had time to see he doesn't turn black, too,' says Marian.

"'He won't,' says Jim, patientlike. 'You see, he won't swallow the drop.' And he began to uncork the vial. 'Are you ready, Theodore?' he asks.

"'Entirely so,' says I. You see, I loved the girl well enough to be willing to turn black if I couldn't have her.

"'Then come on,' says Jim, pouring out the stuff into two glasses. How they happened to be there ought to have puzzled me at the time, but it didn't. 'I think I've divided fair,' says Jim, 'and you can take whichever glass you want.'

"'I'll take the one nearest you,' says I. 'Here's health, anyhow.' And so we drank. You won't make it another dollar, gentlemen? All right; just as you please, of course.

"We went home. All that night I kept feeling myself to see if I was black, but I felt just the same. I guessed I'd won then and went to sleep peaceful. When I woke in the morning I went over to my shaving mirror. I was as black as the ace of spades, gentlemen. And it wouldn't wash off.

"Well, sir, you can guess how I felt. Jim Burley had got her for sure. What riled me more than anything else was my having took the glass nearest him. If I'd taken the other one I'd have been white instead of black. Now I was black instead of white. I tell you, gentlemen, it made me sick.

"I thought of all the trouble I'd had, getting my face bunged up by Jim, and then drilled full of holes, and falling nine hundred feet out of a blazing balloon, just as if I'd been a 'movie' actor instead of an ordinary decent, self-respecting citizen, and it got me sore.

"I had a try at salves and turpentine, but it seemed to have settled too deep for anything to be of much use. I thought of telephoning Marian to take me anyhow, but I knew that wouldn't go. Jim had won her in fair fight, and—well, I had to knuckle under.

"Just then I heard a ring at the door of my apartment. I went and opened it. An ugly-looking buck nigger was standing there.

"'What do you want, you black loafer?' I roared, for I wasn't feeling very kindly toward the colored race, just then. He looks to me. 'What, you too?' he roars. And then I saw that it was Jim.

"'Come in!' I says, frostily, but still glad at heart. But he didn't need the invitation, but just pushed me into my room and pulled the door to after him. And he burst into a roar of laughter.

"'I don't see nothing funny in your remarks,' says I. But Jim only laughs the louder. 'Have you tried turpentine?' he asks.

"'I have, and likewise suds, benzine and gasoline,' I answers, huffily. Then the laughing fit took hold of me as well. 'Say, Jim, you do look like a peach,' I says. 'Do you think Miss Marian will marry you now?'

"'That drop must have divided,' says Jim. 'Well, there's no hope for either of us now, Theodore.'

"'I dunno,' says I. 'I guess it's up to us to commit suicide, if we ain't death-proof, but there's one thing to do first, and that's to bash up Perfesser MacStart.'

"'I'm with you there,' I says. 'When do we begin?'

"'Right now,' he says; and then the telephone rang. 'Excuse me,' says I.

"'I'll go with you,' says Jim, kind of suspicious.

"It was from Marian. 'Congratulate me, boys,' she says. 'I guess you're together. I'm telephoning you from Atlantic City. The perfesser and I were married at six this morning.'

"I don't know that I need to say any more, gentlemen. I've been searching for the perfesser ever since, but I've never found him. In the intervals I've been searching for something to take the color off. I never found that either. Jim and I at last started to work our way through the states to find MacStart. He started from San Francisco and I from New York. I don't know how far he's got, but I've reached Jersey City, as you see, and I hope to make Philadelphia by the end of the year. You don't think it's worth another dollar to help me on my way after my telling you this? Oh, all right, suit yourselves, gentlemen."

Find Intense Cold Over Equatorial Sea

The French meteorologist Teisserenc de Bort gives a remarkable record of temperature observed by means of aeronautical researches in the upper air over the equatorial regions of the Atlantic. Good results were obtained by an expedition by himself and Mrs. Rotch in these regions, and, contrary to expectations, it was found that at high levels in the equatorial air much lower temperatures were recorded than at corresponding heights in the temperate latitudes. Over the equator the isothermal zone seemed to be absent. But the temperature continued to decrease up to the highest point reached, and at altitudes of eight miles or more it was found as low as 112 degrees below zero of Fahrenheit's scale.

This intense cold in the high air over the equatorial Atlantic, on which the sun exerts greatest heating power, seems mysterious, indeed, though there is no reason whatever to question the accuracy of the recording instruments. Its explanation is, perhaps, to be found in the existence of a broad atmospheric current traveling with enormous velocity from east to west at altitudes from five to eight miles above the equatorial regions and apparently circling the globe. It seems probable that on surfaces of such a current, from which masses of air have been violently separated as lateral offshoots, the resulting sudden diminution of pressure and expansion of the air would account for an immense reduction of the temperature below zero.

CHAPTER V

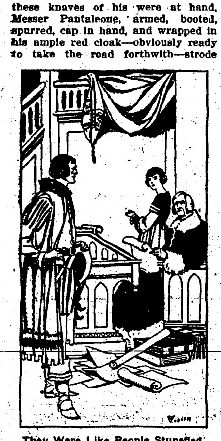
—10—

The manner adopted by Messer Pantaleone in which to do the thing he had been sent to do was startling and yet precisely such as was to have been looked for in a man of his temper.

He had been that day—the day following upon the affair of the lost amulet—down into the borgo of Pievano for the first time since his coming to the castle. As a pretext for this he had urged the need to mend the leg of one of his boots which had become torn during his search last night. (Himself he had ripped it with his dagger.)

He had made his way in the first place to a cobbler, with whom perforce he remained until the required repairs had been effected. From the cobbler's he went to the Osteria del Orso, ostensibly to refresh himself, actually to issue his orders to his knaves through the one he had posted there. It resulted from these movements of his that as dusk was falling his ten sbirri wandered singly and unchallenged over the drawbridge into the empty courtyard of the castle. No guards were kept at Pievano, as we know, and so this furtive and piecemeal invasion was neither hindered nor yet so much as observed.

When he had assured himself that these knaves of his were at hand, Messer Pantaleone, armed, booted, spurred, cap in hand, and wrapped in his ample red cloak—obviously ready to take the road forthwith—strode into the hall of the rocca, that noble chamber where a week ago he had been so charitably received. Now, as then, he found the Lord Almerico engrossed in a volume of manuscript, and Madonna Fulvia with him.



They Were Like People Stupefied.

They looked up sharply, inexplicably startled by the manner of his advent. He did not long intrigue them.

"My lord," he announced bluntly, "I have a duty to perform and ten stout fellows below to help me against the need of help. Will you summon your nephew Matteo Orsini, who is hiding here?"

They were like people stupefied. Then at last the girl spoke, her brows contracted, her eyes flashing like somber jewels in her white face.

"What is your purpose with Matteo?"

"The Lord Cesare Borgia's purpose," he answered brutally. The mask of guile having served its turn was now discarded, and there was no tinge of shame upon the uncovered face of his real self which he now showed them. "I was sent hither to arrest Ser Matteo by order of the duke."

Again there fell a pause, what time those four eyes searched his bold countenance. The Lord Almerico closed his book upon his forefinger, and a faint yet intensely scornful smile broke upon the gray old face.

"Then," said Madonna Fulvia, "all this time we—we have been your dupes. You lied to us. Your faintness, the persecution of which you were the victim, was all so much pretense?" There was a note of incredulity in her voice.

"Necessity," he reminded her, "knows no law. Come," he added roughly. "You have had your fill of looking at me. Let us go to business. Send for this traitor you are harboring."

Madonna Fulvia drew herself stiffly up. "My God!" she exclaimed. "A base Judas, a dirty spy! And I have sat at table with you. We have housed you here as an equal." Her voice soared upward, from the low note of horror and disgust upon which she had spoken. "O vile, O pitiful dog!" she cried. "Was this your errand?—Was this—"

Her father's hand fell gently upon her arm, and silenced her by its mute command. The stoic in him was equal even to so bitter an occasion.

"Hush, child, self-respect forbids that you should address so base a creature even to upbraid it." His voice was calm and level. "What is it to you that he is vile and treacherous, a shameless thing of shame? Does that hurt you? Does it hurt any but himself?"

She swung upon her father in a blaze of passion.

"Aye, does it hurt me," she cried. "It hurts me and it hurts Matteo."

"Can it really hurt a man to die?" wondered Almerico. "Matteo being dead, shall yet live. But that poor thing being living is yet dead."

"Shall we come to business?" quoth Pantaleone, breaking in upon what promised to develop into an eloquent discourse upon life and death, chiefly derived from Seneca. "Will you send for Matteo Orsini, or shall I bid my men drag him from the lazar-house where he skulks. It is idle to resist, futile to delay. My knaves have hemmed the placed about, and none goes in or out save at my pleasure."

He saw a change of expression sweep across both faces. The girl's eyes dilated—with fear, as he supposed; the old man uttered a sharp, short laugh—of stoicism, he opined.

"Why, sir," said Almerico, "since you are so well informed, you had best yourself complete your task of infamy."

Pantaleone looked at him a moment, and then shrugged.

"Be it so," he said shortly, and swung upon his heel to go about it.

"No, no!" It was Madonna Fulvia who arrested him with that cry, sharp with a new anxiety. "Wait, sir! Wait!"

He paused obediently, and half-turned. He beheld her standing tense and straight, one hand pressed upon her bosom as if to quell its tumult, the other held out to him in a gesture of supplication.

"Give me leave to speak with my father alone, ere—ere we decide," she panted.

Pantaleone sniffed, and raised his eyebrows.

"Decide?" quoth he. "What remains to be decided?"

She wrung her hands in a pathetic intensity of mental stress.

"We—we may have a proposal to make to you, sir."

"A proposal?" he said, and scowled. Did they seek to bribe him? "By the Host . . ." he began hotly, and there checked. The cupidity of his nature leapt up instantly, aroused and alert. After all, none save himself was aware of Matteo Orsini's presence at Pievano, and if the price were high enough—who knew?—he might be induced to keep that knowledge to himself. But the price must needs be high to compensate him, not only for the loss of the thousand ducats offered by the duke, but for the hurt his vanity would suffer in the admission of failure.

Seeing him silent, and conceiving that he hesitated, Madonna renewed her prayer. "What harm can it do to grant me this?" she asked. "Have you not said yourself that the place is hemmed about by your men? Are you not therefore master of the situation?"

He bowed stiffly.

"I will concede it you," he said. "I shall await your pleasure in the antechamber." And upon that he went out, his spurs jingling musically.

Left alone, father and daughter looked long at each other.

"Why did you hinder him?" asked the lord of Pievano at length. "Surely you were not moved by any thought of pity for such a man?"

Her lip curled in a scornful smile. "You cannot think that—not in your heart," she said.

She leaned toward him. "To what purpose do you study so deeply the lore of human nature if in practice you cannot probe the shallow, murky depth of such a nature as this dog's?"

He shrank back, staring at her, feeling that his philosophy had taught him nothing, indeed, if in an extremity such as the present one, this child could show him how it should be handled.

Marionettes in History

Marionettes played their parts in the fragrant groves of Nippur and in the hanging gardens of Babylon. Puppets of terra cotta amused the children of the kings of the Nile before the days of the pharaohs.

Their history dates back into the dawn of civilization, long before written chronicles began. Famous men from Sargon I to Bernard Shaw, from William the Conqueror to Wilhelm of Doorn, have been entertained by them.

It may be that the puppets have survived the iconoclastic progress of the centuries because they appeal to the atom of philosophy tucked away in the brain of each human being.

Finger Prints Solve Murder After Years

Berlin.—Finger prints discovered nearly three and a half years after Otto Seinicke left them on a window frame in committing a murder at Bad Oeynhausen proved sufficient to bring the crime home to him when he was arraigned at the present term of court.

Robert Bicker, a young bath attendant at the Oeynhausen Spa, was shot and killed on July 6, 1923, by burglars who had broken into the building he was guarding. Suspected of the crime, Seinicke, and a companion, Heinrich Krueger, were arrested and tried but acquitted because of insufficient evidence.

The police recently made a new examination of the murder chamber, which had been left virtually untouched. High up on a window frame an expert discovered finger prints, still distinct, although evidently made a long time before. Comparison with those of Seinicke on the police records showed they were his. Rearrested and confronted with the finger-print evidence, Seinicke broke down and confessed.

CONVICTED SLAYER DIFFICULT TO HOLD

Escapes Four Times From Prisons in South.

Nashville, Tenn.—Jail officials here have a jinx in the person of one John Revinsky, sentenced to 21 years in prison for killing and robbing Mae Goodwyn, a wealthy underworld queen.

Revinsky just will not stay confined no matter where he is placed. For ten years Tennessee authorities have been trying to make John serve his term. But, apparently, there isn't a jail in the South that will hold him.

It was ten years ago that the murder was committed and the man was held for trial. The date for the trial came, but John was not to be found. He had escaped Nashville's best jail. Months later he was re-arrested, tried, and sentenced.

While waiting to be taken to prison he led a jail break and escaped again. Two years passed. He was arrested once more in Alabama. But when Tennessee police arrived for him he was gone, having sawed his way through the iron bars.

For seven years Revinsky roamed the country, making a wooden thumb to replace one shot off during a jail break. Then he was caught in San Francisco, Calif. Taking no chances, police shackeled him hand and foot and sent him direct to Nashville.

A few nights ago, while all was quiet there, he carefully dug his way through a stone wall and escaped with 13 other prisoners. All of these were recaptured except Revinsky and a new friend, Pete Berbero, bandit.

Uneasy Lies Hangman's Head, Diary Reveals

Bradford, England.—The visions of a hangman do not make pleasant reading, as revealed in the notes of an executioner, James Berry of Bradford, who died some years ago. He was credited with 134 executions, and his weird experiences and sensations are detailed fully in a diary covering several hundred pages.

Berry's most celebrated case and most trying ordeal was that of John Lee. Berry and an assistant, in Exeter prison, tried in vain on four occasions to hang Lee. Each time the drop refused to act, and finally Lee was reprieved.

Of one execution Berry writes: "I am sick at stomach, sick at heart. I am always like that after an execution. I have had no sleep for two nights. I never closed my eyes in Oxford Gaol, where the execution took place, all night long. I could not sleep a wink last night, either. Time and again—a hundred times, it seemed—just as I was about to drift into slumberland, I saw my latest victim before me."

Kidnaped Bride Returns to Husband When of Age

San Francisco.—Interrupted six weeks ago when Mr. and Mrs. William A. Oliver of this city "kidnaped" their daughter, Mrs. Jeannette Laidlaw, on the ground that she was too young to be married without their consent, a wedding banquet was resumed the other day with the original guests in attendance. The daughter was married to Clarence Laidlaw, but six hours later was "kidnaped" from the banquet. After six weeks she became of age and rushed to join her husband.

The Pageant of the Raisin

THE raisin industry of America is mainly limited to a few counties in California, where the climatic and irrigating conditions are ideal—Fresno county producing the major portion of the crop or some 60,000,000 pounds annually. As a natural consequence the city of Fresno determined to make the most of the situation, set itself up as the Capital of Raisinland and annually celebrates the fact by holding the Pageant of the Raisin.

Pates were scratched, histories searched, the tale of the raisin unearthed and around it there was woven a story which reaches back to the Garden of Eden.

The Bible intimates that "old man Noah" planted the first grape vine near Mt. Ararat. The first dried grapes or raisins of which accurate account was found likewise had to do with Armenia.

The valley of the San Joaquin, reasoned the Fresnoians, is "The Garden of the Sun." Therefore, why not a pageant "From the Garden of Eden to the Garden of the Sun?" Accordingly, an annual raisin day—usually during the latter part of April—was decided upon and the people of the valley set about to bring the raisin and Fresno into their own.

When King Grape, preceded by the blare of bands and accompanied by his followers, arrived in "Main Street" Fresno had become the mecca of so many people who happened in to see what all the excitement was all about that it scarcely knew what to do with them. Obviously, they "did it again" next year. Now, most folks know that Fresno is the home of the raisin.

The Veiled Prophet

IT LONG has been the custom of some of our southern cities to have an annual jollification in the shape of a mystical parade or carnival. In 1878 a band of good fellows in the city of St. Louis, who loved and missed these good times, laid the plans for an organization by virtue of which the Veiled Prophet has mysteriously appeared, usually on Tuesday evening of the first week in October, annually ever since.

The prophet and his followers are unknown, but they have been so enthusiastically received that the steady growth of the importance of the event has kept pace with the great progress of the city.

No one knows from whence the prophet comes or whither he disappears. At the appointed time, preceded by the blaring of trumpets, he slips into the city and appears gayly arrayed on a brilliantly decorated float, surrounded by his followers, and followed by a number of floats depicting some historic event parades the principal streets—the whole constituting a pageant of splendor the like of which is seldom witnessed.

No expense is spared in the preparation of this celebration, which is free—for the good people of the city and surrounding territory who care to come and witness this spectacle.

The parade is usually followed by a grand ball. The lady whom the prophet selects to lead the grand march is made queen of the ball and accorded marked social distinction.

The ball of 1887 was graced by the presence of President and Mrs. Grover Cleveland.

The Mason and Dixon Line

THIS famous "line" which for generations served to mark a distinct separation in national thought had its beginning in the boundary line between Pennsylvania and Maryland. No other real or imaginary line in America has been mentioned so frequently that its political meaning was better known than its geographical location.

It was run by two English surveyors, Charles Mason and Jeremiah Dixon, in 1763-1767, to settle an 80-year dispute between the families of William Penn and Lord Baltimore. In those days Pennsylvania was a somewhat indefinite region between Maryland and New England.

The line was marked by milestones brought from England, every fifth one carrying the coat-of-arms of Penn on one side and of Baltimore on the other. After carrying it over the mountains to a point 244 miles from the Delaware river they came upon an Indian war path leading through the forest and their Indian escort told them that it was the will of the Indian nations that they return. As obedience appeared to be the better part of wisdom, Mason and Dixon returned to Philadelphia in 1767 and were discharged.

In ordinary usage the line begins at a triangular post of granite, its sides lettered M, D and P, respectively, at the dividing line between Delaware, Maryland and Pennsylvania and extends westward, over mountain, through valley and across plain—"a chain of stones through the woods."

Drink Water If Back or Kidneys Hurt

Begin Taking Salts If You Feel Backachy or Have Bladder Weakness

Too much rich food, forms acids which excite and overwork the kidneys in their efforts to filter it from the system. Flush the kidneys occasionally to relieve them like you relieve the bowels, removing acids, waste and poison, else you may feel a dull misery in the kidney region, sharp pains in the back or sick headache, dizziness, the stomach sours, tongue is coated, and when the weather is bad you have rheumatic twinges. The urine is cloudy, full of sediment, the channels often get irritated, obliging one to get up two or three times during the night.

To help neutralize these irritating acids and flush off the body's urinous waste, begin drinking water. Also get about four ounces of Jad Salts from any pharmacy, take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine and bladder disorders disappear.

This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help clean and stimulate sluggish kidneys and stop bladder irritation. Jad Salts is inexpensive and makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink which millions of men and women take now and then to help prevent serious kidney and bladder disorders. By all means, drink lots of good water every day.

Thin Cream

Thin cream causes an unnecessary loss of skim-milk. It has a poor keeping quality. It costs the creamery more to handle and churn thin cream than it does richer cream.

Cream testing from 35 per cent to 40 per cent in the summer time and 30 per cent to 35 per cent in the winter is best for both producer and creamery. A Land O' Lakes cream should test at least 25 per cent. This is the official standard, and it is our wish that our patrons check up on their test and see if their test complies with the rules.

WHERE THE MONEY GOES

It cost the electric light and power companies of the country twenty-five dollars per family last year to keep up with the demand for service. Larger generating units and heavier transmission lines are required every year to handle the increased load. A power company must anticipate the needs of a community and be ready to serve them.

A sum equal to ninty cents out of every dollar the people pay to the electric company must go back into the community served to provide for more and better service.

Holt Now Has Radio Station

Great Interest Shown In Work of Local Artists

R. J. Vieths, superintendent of the Holt Consolidated School, has built a radio broadcasting station here and went on the air Saturday afternoon. Just a few minutes after he had announced that the Holt school was on the air, telephone calls began to come in, one by one, and then in pairs. All those who got the station with their sets reported that it was very clear. Parties at Saint Hilaire, Newfolden, Middle River, Thief River Falls, Oklee, and as far off as Grand Forks reported that they heard the station and enjoyed the program which was put on entirely by local talent.

The fans who tuned in on Holt were particularly engrossed in listening to the selections rendered by Albert Haglund and John Arnevik who are experts when it comes to real old time stuff.

George Johnson and Herman Peterson made a business trip to Thief River Falls Monday returning home Tuesday.

Nels Ness and Helmer Brenna made a business trip to Crookston on Monday returning here Tuesday.

Arnold Folden left Monday for Thief River where he will work on a dairy farm.

Mrs. John Gasper returned to Thief River Monday after spending the week end here.

Ben Bradford spent forepart of the week here attending to business.

Senator O. A. Naplin Died

The death at St. Paul recently of Senator O. A. Naplin of Thief River Falls is the second death of a member of the State Senate since the first of the year. The governor will call a special election to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. Naplin.

Mr. Naplin had been an attorney at Thief River Falls since 1910, and is well-known here.

Tale of Three Station Agents

Fred Campbell, temporary station agent for the Great Northern Ry. here, received word Tuesday that August Anfinson of Humboldt, Minnesota, will soon arrive here to fill the vacancy left by R. A. Holmgren. Mr. Campbell, who has been acting as relief agent on this division, and who is here at present, will go to Hillsboro, N. D., where he secured the position as second trick operator.

We have at hand a letter from Mr. Holmgren at Glynden stating that Anfinson and he were school chums, having gone to school together at Thief River Falls when they were boys. Mr. Holmgren also states that we are fortunate in getting Mr. Anfinson, as he is a sociable fellow, con speak the Scandinavian language, and is unmarried. The last-mentioned good point might prove interesting to the young ladies.

Before starting out to work for the Great Northern, both Holmgren and Anfinson worked at the saw-mill at Thief River Falls under Foreman C. L. Sandberg, who is now our local lumber dealer.

SCHOOL NOTES

The seventh grade geography class have begun the study of Asia. This continent is interesting due to the fact that it contains many of the world wonders such as: the highest mountains, the longest desert, and the coldest place in the world.

The eight grade Arithmatic class are studying square root and its application in ordinary everyday problems.

The eight grade history class has begun the study of slavery. This topic starts back in 1619 and takes us to Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation in 1863.

The children in the primary grades have started a milk drinking contest. Each child has a paper milk bottle suspended from his desk on which he puts a star for every glass of milk he drinks. "Cho Cho" the health clown has many stories which tell us what boys and girls must do to be healthy.

The second graders have an arithmatic chart which denotes the rapidity and correctness of each child's work in the three minute tests.

The second graders are striving to climb the stairs on their reading charts. Gorden Ellestad and Clayton Gunheim have almost reached the top stair.

The class in botany had their first meeting on Tuesday. This will be a single semesters course. Some experiments will be done in the laboratory after a few weeks, but they will be few in number due to the short time we have to cover the work.

The English I class are now reading Short stories from the old testament. About three weeks will be spent on this kind of reading.

Report cards came out Tuesday. Din't see any faces, did you?

The barber is an artist
Deserving of our thanks.
No one can do without him
Unless it be the cranks.
The ladies are all lavish in
Bestowing him their praise;
In fact they just adore him, now
That bobbing is a craze.
Sovde is our barber, and
A friend that's always there
With Fitch's preparations
He does his work with care.
Whenever we need primping,
His barber shop we seek.
Most of us call to see him
Once or twice a week.
As man has struggled upward
From the savage and the slave,
with modern food and clothing
Came ye haircut and ye shave.

Minnesota Should Advertise Butter

The butter business is worth more than $100,000,000 a year to Minnesota farmers. It shades into insignificance many industries which spend millions of dollars annually in telling consumers about their goods. One manufacturer spends about $2,000,000 a year to advertise chewing gum; another spend $1,500,000 a year to advertise a small candy mint; ice cream manufacturers are planning a campaign to cost $250,000 a year. Some concerns spend as high as ten per cent of their gross sales in advertising. On this basis, Minnesota, alone, would spend more than $10,000,000 a year in advertising butter. However, the the amount contemplated is only one-twentieth of a cent per pound of butter--not enough to be noticed by any creamery patron but enough to protect his best source of income.

The butter industry of the United States is spending only a relatively small amount of money to inform the consuming public regarding the wonderful merits of its product and of this amount Minnesota, the largest butter-producing state in the Union, contributes not one cent. However, a Minnesota unit of the National Dairy Council has been formed and plans are being formulated whereby this state will enter actively into this work.

Thin Cream

Thin cream causes an unnecessary loss of skim-milk. It has a poor keeping quality. It costs the creamery more to handle and churn thin cream than it does richer cream.

Cream testing from 35 per cent to 40 per cent in the summer time and 30 per cent to 35 per cent in the winter is best for both producer and creamery. A Land O' Lakes cream should test at least 25 per cent. This is the official standard, and it is our wish that our patrons check up on their test and see if their test complies with the rules.

WHERE THE MONEY GOES

It cost the electric light and power companies of the country twenty-five dollars per family last year to keep up with the demand for service. Larger generating units and heavier transmission lines are required every year to handle the increased load. A power company must anticipate the needs of a community and be ready to serve them.

A sum equal to ninty cents out of every dollar the people pay to the electric company must go back into the community served to provide for more and better service.

Holt Now Has Radio Station

Great Interest Shown In Work of Local Artists

R. J. Vieths, superintendent of the Holt Consolidated School, has built a radio broadcasting station here and went on the air Saturday afternoon. Just a few minutes after he had announced that the Holt school was on the air, telephone calls began to come in, one by one, and then in pairs. All those who got the station with their sets reported that it was very clear. Parties at Saint Hilaire, Newfolden, Middle River, Thief River Falls, Oklee, and as far off as Grand Forks reported that they heard the station and enjoyed the program which was put on entirely by local talent.

The fans who tuned in on Holt were particularly engrossed in listening to the selections rendered by Albert Haglund and John Arnevik who are experts when it comes to real old time stuff.

George Johnson and Herman Peterson made a business trip to Thief River Falls Monday returning home Tuesday.

Nels Ness and Helmer Brenna made a business trip to Crookston on Monday returning here Tuesday.

Arnold Folden left Monday for Thief River where he will work on a dairy farm.

Mrs. John Gasper returned to Thief River Monday after spending the week end here.

Ben Bradford spent forepart of the week here attending to business.

Senator O. A. Naplin Died

The death at St. Paul recently of Senator O. A. Naplin of Thief River Falls is the second death of a member of the State Senate since the first of the year. The governor will call a special election to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. Naplin.

Mr. Naplin had been an attorney at Thief River Falls since 1910, and is well-known here.

Tale of Three Station Agents

Fred Campbell, temporary station agent for the Great Northern Ry. here, received word Tuesday that August Anfinson of Humboldt, Minnesota, will soon arrive here to fill the vacancy left by R. A. Holmgren. Mr. Campbell, who has been acting as relief agent on this division, and who is here at present, will go to Hillsboro, N. D., where he secured the position as second trick operator.

We have at hand a letter from Mr. Holmgren atGlynden stating that Anfinson and he were school chums, having gone to school together at Thief River Falls when they were boys. Mr. Holmgren also states that we are fortunate in getting Mr. Anfinson, as he is a sociable fellow, con speak the Scandinavian language, and is unmarried. The last-mentioned good point might prove interesting to the young ladies.

Before starting out to work for the Great Northern, both Holmgren and Anfinson worked at the saw-mill at Thief River Falls under Foreman C. L. Sandberg, who is now our local lumber dealer.

The eight grade Arithmatic class are studying square root and its application in ordinary everyday problems.

The eight grade history class has begun the study of slavery. This topic starts back in 1619 and takes us to Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation in 1863.

The children in the primary grades have started a milk drinking contest. Each child has a paper milk bottle suspended from his desk on which he puts a star for every glass of milk he drinks. "Cho Cho" the health clown has many stories which tell us what boys and girls must do to be healthy.

The second graders have an arithmatic chart which denotes the rapidity and correctness of each child's work in the three minute tests.

The second graders are striving to climb the stairs on their reading charts. Gorden Ellestad and Clayton Gunheim have almost reached the top stair.

The class in botany had their first meeting on Tuesday. This will be a single semesters course. Some experiments will be done in the laboratory after a few weeks, but they will be few in number due to the short time we have to cover the work.

The English I class are now reading Short stories from the old testament. About three weeks will be spent on this kind of reading.

The barber is an artist,
Deserving of our thanks.
No one can do without him
Unless it be the cranks.
The ladies are all lavish in
Bestowing him their praise;
In fact they just adore him, now
That bobbing is a craze.
Sovde is our barber, and
A friend that's always there
With Fitch's preparations
He does his work with care.
Whenever we need primping,
His barber shop we seek.
Most of us call to see him

From the savage and the slave,

Came ye haircut and ye shave.

Minnesota Should Advertise Butter

The butter business is worth more than $100,000,000 a year to Minnesota farmers. It shades into insignificance many industries which spend millions of dollars annually in telling consumers about their goods. One manufacturer spends about $2,000,000 a year to advertise chewing gum; another spend $1,500,000 a year to advertise a small candy mint; ice cream manufacturers are planning a campaign to cost $250,000 a year. Some concerns spend as high as ten per cent of their gross sales in advertising. On this basis, Minnesota, alone, would spend more than $10,000,000 a year in advertising butter. However, the the amount contemplated is only one-twentieth of a cent per pound of butter--not enough to be noticed by any creamery patron but enough to protect his best source of income.

The butter industry of the United States is spending only a relatively small amount of money to inform the consuming public regarding the wonderful merits of its product and of this amount Minnesota, the largest butter-producing state in the Union, contributes not one cent. However, a Minnesota unit of the National Dairy Council has been formed and plans are being formulated whereby this state will enter actively into this work.

The Way of a Maid with a Man

—11—

"Do you not know—does it not say so in any of those pages—that who betrays once will betray again and yet again? Do you not see that a man so vile as to have played that knave's part will be vile enough to sell his own master, will be true to naught save his own base interests?"

"You mean that we should bribe him?"

She drew herself up, and uttered a short laugh. "I mean that we should seem to bribe him. Oh!" She pressed her hands to her white brow. "I have a vision of something that lies before us here. It is as if a door had been opened, a weapon thrust into my hand by means of which I can smite and at a blow avenge all the wrongs of the Orsini.

"Pish, you are fevered, child! Here is no work for a weak maid—"

"Not for a weak maid—no; but for a strong one," she broke in impetuously; "work for a woman of the Orsini. Listen." She leaned toward him again, lowering her voice instinctively because of the secret thing she had to communicate.

He listened, hunched in his chair, and the farther she proceeded the more hunched he became, like one who instinctively gathers himself together against a blow that is about to fall.

"My God!" he gasped when she had done, and his old eyes stared at her between amazement and dismay. "My God! And your pure virgin mind has conceived this horror! In all these years I have not known you, Fulvia. I have deemed you a child, and you—" Words eluded him. Limply he waved his old transparent hands. The stoic in him had succumbed to the parent.

He would have dissuaded her out of his deep concern for her, his only child. But she was not to be dissuaded. She argued on, gathering enthusiasm as she dwelt upon the means by which she would at a single blow strike down this base betrayer and his master, the duke of Valentinois. She urged that there was no safety for her or him or any Orsini in her refraining from this step upon which she was resolved. She reminded him that as long as Cesare Borgia lived no single Orsini would be safe, and she concluded by announcing that she believed her mission inspired by heaven itself, that she a maid and the weakest of the Orsini should avenge the wrongs of their house and stay its further ruin.

At last his shocked, bruised mind became infected by something of her ardor; enough, at least, to wring from him a grudging, fearful consent to let her have her way.

"Leave me," she said, "to deal with Cesare Borgia and his lackey, and do you pray for the souls of us both."

Upon that she kissed him, and swept out to the impatient Pantaleone waiting in the sparsely furnished antechamber.

He rose as she entered, marking her pallor and obvious agitation. To the stately beauty of her, her slim height and the fine poise of her lovely head, he remained indifferent.

She came to lean against the table, facing him across it, considering him with a glance that was steady despite the tremors agitating all the rest of her.

Pantaleone was shrewd and crafty as we know, but his craft was a shallow business when compared with her own; his shrewdness was mere low cunning when contrasted with the agile wits which her frail exterior dissembled.

In the moment in which he had revealed himself for what he was she had judged him, and she had judged him to the weight of a hair of his vile head. Upon that judgment she now went to work.

"Consider me well, Ser Pantaleone," she invited him, her voice level and calm.

He did so, wondering whither this might lead.

"Tell me now, do you find me fair to see, and am I not shapely?"

He bowed, his face almost sardonic. "Fair as an angel, assuredly, Madonna. The duke's sister, Monna Lucrezia, would suffer by comparison. But what has this to do with—?"

"In short, sir, do you account me desirable?"

The question robbed him of breath, so amazing was it. His pulses were quickened under her steady glance and her no less steady invitation to appraise her. He pondered her now, and discovered a thousand graces in her to which he had hitherto been blind. He may even have realized that her chaste, frail beauty held a subtler appeal than the grosser feminity to which his senses more usually responded.

"Desirable as paradise," said he at last, dropping his voice.

"And to render me so, there is not merely this perishable beauty that is mine. I am well dowered. A matter of ten thousands ducats goes with me to the man I wed," she informed him, and turned him giddy by the mention of so vast a sum.

"Ten thousand ducats?" he repeated slowly, awestricken.

"To the man who weds me," she insisted, and added quietly—"Will you be that man?"

"Will I . . . . ?" He checked. No, no. The thing was incredible. The shock of that question almost stunned him. He gaped at her, and his handsome face turned pale under its tan.

"Upon the condition, of course," she pursued, "that you abandon this quest for Ser Matteo, and bear word to your master that he is not to be found."

"Of course, of course," he mumbled foolishly. Then he reassembled his scattered wits and set them to read him this riddle. She was Matteo's betrothed. She loved Matteo. And yet . . . Or could it be that her love was of that great self-sacrificing kind of which he had heard—but in which he had never believed—that will surrender all for the sake of the beloved? He could not swallow that. It was not in his nature to be so credulous. And then he threw up his head, his nostrils quivering. Suddenly he scented danger. A trap was being baited for him. Bluntly he said so, laughing short and scornfully.

But her reply disarmed his last suspicion.

"Take your own measures," she invited him serenely. "I understand your fears. But we are honorable folk, and if I swear to you that Matteo Orsini shall not stir hence until this matter is done beyond recalling, so shall it be. Yet take your measures. You have the men and the power. Let them remain at their post surrounding that garden. Do that tonight, and tomorrow I will ride with you to Castel della Pieve to become your wife."

Slowly he licked his lips, and his bold eyes narrowed as they surveyed her greedily. Yet still he was suspicious. Still he could not believe in so much good fortune.

"Why at Castel della Pieve?" he asked. "Why not here?"

"Because I must be sure that you will keep faith. Castel della Pieve is the nearest place—yet far enough to leave Matteo a clear road of flight."

"I understand," he said slowly.

"And you agree?"

His keen black eyes stabbed into her calm white face as though they would pierce to her very soul and probe its secrets. It was incredible. What greater profit—what profit one-tenth as great could he look for in taking Ser Matteo, in keeping faith with Valentinois? He made, you see, no attempt to struggle with the temptation. He did not give so much as a thought to a young woman in the Bolognese—one Leocadia by name—who kept a wine-shop at Laveno, who had borne him a son and whom he had promised to marry. If he hesitated, it was only because the thing proposed him was beyond belief. It bewildered him; a fog settled down upon his wits. By the Host! How she must love this fellow Matteo! Or was it—was it perhaps that he himself . . .

Greatness Must Be Won

There are two ends to every ladder—and the bottom is where one starts. The man at the top, disappointing though he may look, did not fly there. It is not often that men "have greatness thrust upon them."

"Modern Conveniences"

Archeologists have been reporting so rapidly the unearthing of temples and tombs that readers are becoming a little blase about ancient news. So the preliminary reports the other day of a Swedish discovery on the Greek Peloponnesus of a royal tomb perhaps thirty-five hundred years old, of pieces of gold, and of materials throwing light on life in Greece nearly five thousand years ago, perhaps awakened less popular interest than it deserved.

But modern house-hunters will be glad to hear that in the dwelling section of this ancient city were found the remains of a Roman bath, with marble-lined tubs for hot and cold water. Some of the underground plumbing, says Doctor Frodin, leader of the expedition, is in such good condition that it could be used today. The old Greeks apparently could "plumb" as well as they could fight.—The Outlook.

QUIT THE BARGAIN COUNTERS

By HENRY AARONS

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman.)

"ANNABEL, dear, I—I prefer to buy my own things—I—"

"Harry! After I thought I was giving you such a nice surprise—and—"

Here the pretty face of the three-months' bride buried itself in a handkerchief, and was the next instant transferred to the coat collar of the remorseful young husband, who after restoring peace and harmony, gave one rueful glance at the collection of misfit underwear, out-of-date neckties, rainbow-hued socks, and fled.

Annabel had really given her husband a surprise, but not the "nice" one she expected. She had developed a bad case of the bargain counter malady, and had brought home such delectably cheap things for her darling Harry, she believed he would be delighted at her economical foresight. But the underwear was two sizes too small, and the kind he never wore. He abhorred green socks, and that color in ties was frightfully unbecoming to him.

Mrs. Harte put away the offending purchases, and concluded Harry was just a bit out of humor.

The next time she struck a bargain counter of men's furnishings, she couldn't resist buying something more for Harry. This time she knew he would be pleased. But he wasn't. He gently but firmly tried to make her promise not to do it any more.

"I just believe if you had married Mamie Beck instead of me, you'd have liked what she bought for you," pouted Annabel.

"Mamie Beck!" snorted Harte. "I never thought of marrying her!"

"Oh yes, you did, and you wouldn't have found fault with any nice little thing she wanted to do for you!"

Whereat there had to be more overtures of reconciliation, and again Harte fled from the bargain display including terrible pink shirts with reversible cuffs, and wondered what could be done to reform Annabel.

He loved his affectionate little wife, and was unselfish enough to stand considerable discomfort rather than make her unhappy; but his salary was only a moderate one, and the waste of money in buying useless articles was something that must be seriously considered.

Once when he had remonstrated with her, she had said: "But I don't buy anything for myself, dear," and he had answered: "Well, I wish you would," she had taken it for his unselfishness instead of the sarcasm he had meant. So what was to be done? Annabel seemed to be devoid of a sense of humor, but she was so sweet and dear in her well-meant expenditure for him, and never extravagant for herself, he didn't know how to meet the situation.

On the arrival of the fourth bargain counter consignment Harte felt that the time had come for a decided stand. The result was a quarrel which grew to such alarming proportions that Annabel insisted he was still in love with Mamie Beck, and firmly declared her intention of getting a divorce.

Harte flung out of the house, nonplussed, angry, and thoroughly miserable. He felt he could no longer stand his wife's unreasoning folly, he could not live with her—and he was forced to confess he could not live without her. He walked wildly, irresponsibly down the street.

All at once he found himself face to face with Mamie Beck. She noticed the white, set face, and though he made an effort to go on, she detained him.

"Harry, what is the matter?" she asked.

"Why, nothing," was the evasive answer.

"Yes, there is. Can't I help you?"

The question was so full of good, wholesome sympathy it began to melt the barriers he had set up between them. He had not meant anyone should know; but the desire to be understood, when a soul is floundering in deep water, is often so strong as to sweep away the bars of discretion. Harte let her know something of the reason for his unhappiness.

"Come home with me. Let us talk it over," she said.

The two walked on for several blocks and entered Mamie Beck's home together.

Meanwhile Annabel, the moment Harte had left the house, had felt a sudden pang of remorse, and determined to dry her eyes, rush out, and get something she knew Harry especially liked for dinner. She meant to have it all ready for him when he came back, and to try to make amends for what she had said. She dressed, and started for the shop to make her purchases. Thank heaven there was no bargain counter there! Turning a corner, she gave a start! There was her husband with Mamie Beck, the two walking slowly, in earnest conversation. They were on the opposite side of the street, and they did not see her. She found herself following them. It was not a fine thing to do. But was she not his wife? That seemed to her to excuse it all.

She saw them enter Mamie Beck's home. This then was the solution! He did care for this other woman! He was tired of her so soon! Not yet married five months, and it was all over, the happiness, the love upon which she had built such wonderful castles of delight!

She did not go to the shop. What was the use? He might not even come home to dinner. She went back, flung herself down, and wept and sobbed as never had she done before.

After a time she heard his latchkey in the door. She rose quickly and tried to bathe away the traces of her tears. She did not mean he should see how she had suffered, or that she had seen him with Mamie Beck. She meant to find out how far things had gone. If she could prove that he did love this other woman she would have good grounds for a divorce! It seemed now to mean the wrecking of her whole life!

She met her husband with an icy reserve that left him very little opportunity for attempts at reconciliation. The next morning, having thawed a little, he met her more than half way. But as fate or some other psychological factor would have it, that very day she again saw Harry with Mamie Beck. They stood outside of a shop, and oh, horrors! she saw him hand her money. There was no mistaking it for Mamie opened her purse and put it in, and both laughed heartily as they parted.

No wonder she, his wife, was berated for spending foolishly when he was giving money to other women.

That evening Harry met his wife more affectionately than ever. He had a nice little surprise for her, and he opened a parcel he had brought in. He proudly displayed a purple shirtwaist about two years out of date, a pair of cheap, yellow silk stockings several sizes too large, and a petticoat built for a miss of fourteen.

He tried to preserve a strictly neutral exterior as he noted the look of dismay with which Annabel surveyed the articles.

"I got them so cheap, dear, I couldn't resist buying them. I hope you like the things. I had an awful time getting them, there was such a mob of women. But you see I did think of you!"

"Harry Harte! You know I never wear purple!" cried Annabel.

"Oh, don't you?" he responded with carefully assumed innocent surprise.

"And these stockings! Do you think I wear a number nine shoe?"

"They are a trifle large, aren't they?"

"A man never knows about such things. Please don't buy anything more."

It was Harte's turn to put on the hurt air, which he did with all due elaboration. Annabel certainly was devoid of a sense of humor. Nevertheless about two days later he appeared before his astonished wife with a pair of oversized gloves, and a hat of the vintage of 1910, which he told Annabel he had bought for her for next to nothing.

This was the last straw. Annabel overflowed with indignation.

"I see it all!" she stormed. "You want to make a perfect fright of me so people will sympathize with you for being tied up to such a frump, and so you can get a divorce and marry Mamie Beck!"

Harte's face expressed utter despair, this time not all assumed. His trump card had failed.

"Well, I thought I was pleasing you," he said disconsolately. "I suppose if you had married Tom Bennett you'd have liked what he bought for you."

His retort was so nearly identical with her own on a previous occasion that suddenly a light seemed to break in on her.

Did he really care for her? But what about Mamie Beck, and what she had seen with her own eyes?

"Look here!" she cried. "You never bought such atrocious things as these! You couldn't have found them in a day's journey! You just got someone to do it."

"Yes, I did."

"Was it Mamie Beck?"

"Yes."

"And you went and told her everything!"

"Listen, dear! It was all accidental. We met on the street, she saw how miserable I looked, she drew it out of me, she only wanted us both to be happy again."

"Oh!"

The exclamation was dry and doubtful.

"Look here, Annabel! Everything she said and did was for—"

"For my good."

Something like that missing sense of humor began to twitch the corners of her mouth.

"Well—I guess she was right," said Annabel. "Ask her to dinner tomorrow. It's no more bargain counters for me, honey—if you'll swear off."

The compact was not signed in words, but something much more expressive.

Pertinent Comment

Viscountess Astor, in her famous "mother love" interview in New York, paid her respects to Paris.

"Paris originates all our fashions," she said, "but she doesn't originate them for us, but for demimondaines. Isn't it time we revolted? Shouldn't mother love see to it that our daughters shall no longer be taken for demimondaines?

"The essence of Parish fashions is—to use a mild word—immodesty.

"A middle western American was describing a European tour.

"'And in France,' he said, 'in one part of France we hunted bear.'

"Another middle westerner said: "'They dance that way, too, over there, I understand.'"

Devil's Lake

DEVIL'S LAKE—the great salt lake of North Dakota, the largest body of water between the great lakes and the Rockies—is about thirty miles long, from three to fifteen miles wide and, in places, from seventy to eighty feet deep.

Scientists believe that this peculiar location for such a lake lies in the fact that an ancient river valley became partially jammed with drift, leaving a submerged rock-lined area which naturally filled with water, forming this lake. Its source being in saline springs accounts for the saltiness of the water. The Indians, being suspicious of this water, called it "Minnewaukon"—meaning "evil water."

This lake was the scene of a tragic skirmish in frontier days between the United States troops, under command of General Sully, and the Sioux Indians, during which the latter were defeated and driven into the lake. Sully's Hill National park on the southern shore of the lake was established to commemorate General Sully's victory. The Fort Totten Indian reservation is also located here. Many hills or mounds from which countless relics have been taken for university and museum collections surround this lake.

That the surface of the lake has been considerably higher than it is now is shown by wave marks on trees. That it also has been much lower than it is at present is attested by trees which are submerged in it. During recent years the difference between high and low stages has averaged about four feet.

A Bathing Beauty Pageant

ATLANTIC CITY, New Jersey, with its famous board-walk skirting the ocean shore for several miles holds an annual pageant which is one of the great civic celebrations of America.

The week's fun begins with the arrival of King Neptune and his court of beauty, selected from the prettiest girls in that vicinity. Originally a gala occasion consisting of a one-day board-walk rolling chair parade, this celebration has been expanded to include an inter-city beauty contest—the leading cities of the country sending their prettiest girls from among whom the judges select the most charming girl in America.

The bather's revue brings aspirants for glory of feminine attractiveness together in competition for the title of the most beautiful bathing maid. The entire assemblage of bathing beauties is eyed by thousands of visitors while being judged by artists for both facial beauty and charm of form.

The rolling chair parade, consisting of hundreds of flower-bedecked and ingeniously decorated chairs and floats constructed on rolling chairs and carrying the leading beauties of the country, is a unique feature.

Then, there are great night carnivals, sea spectacles, fancy-dress balls and banquets galore. The winners of the several contests are finally judged in class for the awarding of the golden mermaid—emblematic of the beauty supremacy of the entire week.

The Bad Lands

IN SOUTHWESTERN North Dakota there is a wild and weird region, rich in romance, exciting in history, of unquestioned ugliness and saturated with interest that is markedly different from any other known section of the world's surface.

It extends about ninety miles north and south by about fourteen miles east and west and is called the Bad Lands—not because of lack of law and order, but because it is difficult to traverse.

The Little Missouri river has cut deep-sided canyons through it. Time and the elements have fashioned the region behind them into a labyrinth of smaller valleys, ridges, gullies, rugged hillsides, peaks and flat-topped buttes.

Underlying these lands were many beds of lignite coal. These burned out. The heat painted the rocks and mounds a profusion of colors. Many of the overhanging cliffs tumbled down. This resulted in a chaotic desolation and indescribable waste that is appalling.

In summer the streams dry up. Their sun-baked bottoms crack open. The spring floods turn these stream beds into swirling rivers. Their waters carry loose dirt and rock and erode the landscape into an endless variety of odd formations. Here and there slender columns of clay hold up great hunks of sandstone, rise hundreds of feet and look like monstrous toadstools. The bright sunlight intensifies this colorful combination, producing a picture that is beyond the imagination.

The Bad Lands have contributed many beautiful agates, crystals and fossil remains to museum collections in various parts of the world.

If Back Hurts Flush Kidneys

Drink Plenty of Water and Take Glass of Salts Before Breakfast Occasionally

When your kidneys hurt and your back feels sore, don't get scared and proceed to load your stomach with a lot of drugs that excite the kidneys and irritate the entire urinary tract. Keep your kidneys clean like you keep your bowels clean, by flushing them with a mild, harmless salts which helps to remove the body's urinous waste and stimulate them to their normal activity.

The function of the kidneys is to filter the blood. In 24 hours they strain from it 500 grains of acid and waste, so we can readily understand the vital importance of keeping the kidneys active.

Drink lots of good water—you can't drink too much; also get from any pharmacist about four ounces of Jad Salts. Take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast each morning for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help clean and stimulate clogged kidneys; also to neutralize the acids in the system so they are no longer a source of irritation, thus often relieving bladder weakness.

Jad Salts is inexpensive; cannot injure; makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink which everyone should take now and then to help keep their kidneys clean and active. Try this; also keep up the water drinking, and no doubt you will wonder what became of your kidney trouble and backache.

Don't dope YOUR Cough

IT is not wise to use remedies which depend upon "dope" such as narcotics, chloroform, cannabis or tar products. They may stop your cough temporarily by numbing the tissues, as most cough mixtures do, but this is not enough.

The inflamed air passages must be soothed naturally, the germ-laden mucus loosened and expelled in order to effect a lasting recovery. PERTUSSIN assists Nature to accomplish these results in a remarkably short time—and it is absolutely harmless.

Health and Home

CAMPING AND PROBLEM OF FOOD

There is no healthier sport than camping. During the warm and balmy spring and summer days, it is real recreation. To get out in the fresh air and sunshine, free from worry and care, enhances the health of any one, be he office man, salesman or what not.

But due to the entirely inadequate means of food preservation and refrigeration found in the majority of camps, there is the ever-present danger of sickness from infected foods. The utmost care must be taken in order that this may be avoided. Butter and eggs should be bought only as used. The milk is a problem in itself. Perhaps the solution lies in the use of a milk other than market milk, in order that purity and sterility may be assured. For such use, evaporated milk is ideal. Many people are wont to confuse evaporated and condensed milk but there is no similarity between the two. Condensed milk is a combination of sugar and milk and can be used only when both of these substances are desired. Evaporated milk is merely pure, fresh milk with about sixty per cent of the water removed and the nutrient content left intact. It is absolutely sterile and pure, having been sterilized before leaving the factory. The water, removed by evaporation, may be replaced very easily and the milk returned to its original volume. Evaporated milk may be obtained in small cans, containing six ounces or in larger ones containing sixteen and can be taken to the camp in quantities sufficient for the needs of the entire period, thus assuring a constant supply of pure, fresh milk without the worry or the danger attached to the use of the market product.

Following are recipes for a few dishes that are best adapted for camp consumption because of ease of preparation, purity and food value.

Tomato Soup.

1 pint tomato pulp or canned tomato soup	1½ cups water
1½ cups evaporated milk	Salt and pepper to taste
	½ tsp. soda

Bring tomato pulp or soup to the boil, add the seasonings and soda. Heat the milk and water and combine slowly with the tomato mixture.

Shirred Eggs.

½ cup evaporated milk	½ tsp. paprika
½ cup water	6 eggs
½ tsp. pepper	2 tbsp. fat
	Grated cheese

Beat the eggs, add the milk, water and seasonings. Melt the fat in a frying pan. Add the egg mixture and stir until the mixture is creamy. When almost done, sprinkle with grated cheese. Serve on slices of bread, toast or crackers.

Sight of Cats and Owls

The belief that cats and owls can see in the dark is a popular fallacy. The iris of a cat's eye is capable of great variation, so as to admit more or less light, thus enabling the cat to see much better in the dusk than can humans, but in absolute darkness all animals are as helpless as any human being. The feature which adapts certain eyes for use with only a poor light is the constitution of the retina which is composed of two sets of structures, the so-called rods and cones. The rods are apparently affected by radiation slightly before the cones, and hence some creatures, including owls, whose eyes possess a large proportion of cones, are better suited for seeing in a faint light.

Uncomplimentary

The county inspector was paying his monthly visit to the village school. He examined the children in reading and general knowledge, as was his custom, and was very pleased with the answers he received. After the last question he rose to his feet and, looking slowly around on the upturned faces, remarked genially: "I wish I was a little boy at school again." He allowed a few moments for this to sink in and then added: "Do you know why I wish that?" For a moment or two there was silence, and then a childish voice from the back of the room was heard to say: "'Cas you've forgot all you ever knowed."—Atlanta Journal.

Storm Clouds' Visibility

The weather bureau says that the distance at which storm clouds are visible to the naked eye varies greatly with one's position and the kind of clouds. If a person is in an open flat country and the clouds are of the broad stratus or layer type, he may not see them more than 30 or 40 miles away, and even not half so far if the air tends to be misty or hazy. On the other hand, when the air is quite clear a well developed cumulo-nimbus, or thunderstorm, cloud may, in favorable circumstances, be seen when more than 100 miles away.

Franking Privilege

The privilege of sending and receiving mail free of postage was once enjoyed by the President of the United States, vice president, heads of departments, senators and representatives, and other officials of the government during their official terms. For a time all former presidents and widows of former presidents also had this right; but by an act of 1873 the privilege was abolished. By later acts it was conferred on all officers of the government in the case of official correspondence. In 1895 members of congress were allowed this privilege in their official correspondence.

HOW TO SAVE MONEY WHEN SHOPPING

By MRS. HARLAND H. ALLEN

(©, 1923, Harland H. Allen.)

BUYING THE NEW SUIT

The most difficult dress to manage economically is probably the tailored suit. Of course the shops are always flooded with cheap suits, but these are likely to prove a snare and a pitfall, unless you are prepared to recognize quality in material, and good workmanship when you see it.

What most women want at the present is a suit that can be worn at least two years. It is considered economical to distribute your purchases so that suit, furs and coat do not all come out of one year's salary. And in general, the highest-priced suit, if simple in design, will wear longer, for it is apt to be made of better grade material.

Shall the suit coat be long or short? It depends upon the figure of the girl, what style of suit she should get. If you are inclined to be too tall, or lanky, you will do well to avoid the severe long lines, and choose rather something on the style of the short box coat. On the other hand, if you are desirous of appearing taller and slenderer than you really are, the long coat will give you just the height and "straightness" that you need.

Choice of material for the new suit always presents a problem. The cloth must be durable, for only then can it be depended upon to give the wear required for the thrifty shopper. Each season sees Fashion's own pet fabrics brought to the fore, but what is most important from the shopper's standpoint, is to get a cloth that will hold its shape, and not wear shiny, nor spot easily when exposed to the street dust and all sorts of weather. Soft dark hues are more practical for constant use than either pale or brilliant colors.

The good shopper will instinctively strike a happy medium between the fussy, unpractical suit, and the too severe model. Embroidery is all right for the suit that is intended for more formal wear, but a great deal of fancy trimming makes a suit too "dressy" for everyday wear. Whenever trimming is used on the best type of suits, it is usually self-colored or black soutache.

Remember, also, to be conservative about buying striking and bizarre models. Some of these enjoy only a brief season's vogue, and if worn the next season will make you appear conspicuous.

Must Be a Limit.

"About how much will this operation be, doctor?"

"Can't say; depends on how deep I will have to cut."

"But I'm only about 13 inches through!"—Passing Show, London.

Aborigines' Tobacco

Australian bushmen show great discrimination in their smoking and are adept at "curing" wild tobacco. The leaves of this plant resemble those of tobacco plants, but are smaller. The leaf gives off a nicotine oil; is pleasant to the taste, and burns well. After the leaf is gathered it is allowed to wilt but not dry. In the fermentation process damp sacks are thrown over the leaves in a warm and shady place for about a week. Then follows the drying in some airy place until the leaf shows a leathery texture. The midribs and stalks are now removed and the leaf is arranged in layers and sprinkled with heated treacle, rum, and, if possible, a little saltpeter. The whole is then packed in a box and pressed until the curing is complete.

Too Much "Acid?"

Excess Uric Acid Gives Rise to Many Unpleasant Troubles.

AUTHORITIES agree that an excess of uric acid is primarily due to faulty kidney action. Retention of this toxic material often makes its presence felt by sore, painful joints, a tired, languid feeling and, sometimes, toxic backache and headache. That the kidneys are not functioning right is often shown by scanty or burning passage of secretions. Thousands assist their kidneys at such times by the use of Doan's Pills—a stimulant diuretic. Doan's are recommended by many local people. Ask your neighbor!

FIND TWO COMETS IN SINGLE DAY

Scientists Hang Up New Astronomical Record.

Boston, Mass.—Discovery of a new comet on the same day as the rediscovery of an old one by the man who originally found it was the astronomical record hung up by European astronomers recently, according to Dr. Harlow Shapeley. Doctor Shapley is director of the Harvard college observatory, which acts as a clearing house for news of astronomical discoveries.

The new comet was picked up by Dr. J. Comas-Sola, director of the Fabra observatory at Barcelona, Spain, and following the usual practice, will become known to astronomers as Comas-Sola's comet.

When discovered, it was in the constellation of Cetus, the Whale, which can be seen in the southeastern sky in the evening. It was moving to the southwest, but as it is of the twelfth magnitude, a good-sized telescope is now required to see it.

Neujmin's comet was the celestial visitor which returned, and was picked up the same day by Dr. G. Neujmin at the observatory at Simeis, Russia. Doctor Neujmin originally found this comet on February 24, 1916, and calculated that its orbit would bring it back every five and one-half years. In November 16, 1920, he photographed a strange celestial object, which is believed to have been his comet, but as sufficient observations to accurately determine its orbit were not obtained, this is not certain.

When rediscovered on this trip, Neujmin's comet was in the constellation of Leo the Lion, near the handle of the familiar "Sickle," which can be seen in the eastern sky for a few hours before sunrise. It is even fainter than Comas-Sola's comet, as it was of the fourteenth magnitude.

France May Sell Prison of "Man in Iron Mask"

Paris.—Plans of the French government to sell the island of Ste. Marguerite, where the "Man in the Iron Mask" was imprisoned for ten years, have met with much antagonism. The report that British capital was planning to turn the island into a model winter resort has brought protestations from every part of the Riviera. The district is already objecting to the numerous subdivisions financed by foreign capital.

The island of Ste. Marguerite, which is about four miles in circumference, is situated at the mouth of the Cannes bay. The "Man in the Iron Mask," made famous by Dumas, was incarcerated in the Ste. Marguerite fortress in 1687. History still disputes his identity. It is reported that the French government has been offered a large sum for the island, but newspapers and societies are fighting the proposed sale.

Rain-Making Machinery Constructed in Russia

Leningrad.—A factory for building rain-making machinery is under construction here. The Leningrad Mellorative Institute recently sent a rain-making expedition to the remote trans-Caucasian farming station of Ganji, to make careful experiments in rain production. On the basis of this expedition's report of brilliant success, construction of the factory was begun. Further tests in the Mugan steppe and in central Asia are being made. The nature of the rain-making method and the character of machinery necessary to produce rain on demand have not yet been explained.

360-Pound Snake Caught After More Than a Year

Rio de Janeiro.—A giant "Succri" snake, member of the boa family, more than 30 feet in length and weighing 360 pounds, was recently captured in the state of Matto Grosso and brought to the Rio de Janeiro zoological garden by Ignacio Augusto Nascimento, who led a party that pursued the snake for more than a year. Nascimento set out to capture the largest snake ever seen here, and succeeded. Twelve men were needed to handle the boa when it arrived at the zoo.

New York.—Thomas F. Manville, Jr., heir of millions, thinks his wife is "a wonderful kid," but he and she are not suited temperamentally, and so they have separated. He advertises he will not be responsible for her debts, but is paying her $1,000 a month. She was once his father's secretary.

Device May Help Find Ships on Ocean's Bed

Tacoma, Wash.—Forgotten tragedies of the Pacific may soon be revealed by a device adapted from the hydrophone, which detects the grating sound of hulls on the ocean bed. Lieutenant Commander T. J. Meyers of the coast and geodetic survey is sounding the ocean floor up and down the Washington coast and plans to drag a number of locations to establish the origin of strange noises. The geodetic surveyors are working off the mouth of the Columbia river, a graveyard of old sailing vessels.

SO MANY ALIASES, FORGOT OWN NAME

Crook Apparently Puzzled for Some Time.

New York.—A criminal of many aliases was being interrogated by detectives. Most crooks are satisfied with one or two, but this particular crook found it convenient to have six or seven fictitious names ready to use. And on different occasions he "had traveled," as the police say, under each of his names. In one city he assumed the name of Jim Jones and in another the name of Tom Smith.

His captors were fairly familiar with his numerous aliases, and the mention of any one of them recalled the picture of a short, thick fellow with a long nose and a pair of small, fishy eyes. A detective had written the aliases on a piece of paper. After studying them a moment he turned to the prisoner and asked gruffly: "Which of these names is your right one?"

The crook examined the list intently and appeared puzzled. "Blest if I know," he replied with a smile. "You see," he added apologetically, "I've been travelin' under these here names so long that I've clean forgot my right name. But it will come to me after a bit," and sure enough he soon recalled it. The name, however, was not among the aliases.

Would Like to Forget.

"I think this fellow," said a detective, "was just pretending he did not remember his name. Indeed, he would like to forget it if he could, because he has been tried and convicted under that name for more offenses than he can remember. He is, like most experienced crooks, a masquerader. All crooks are masqueraders, in a sense, and go through life wearing a mask.

"After being initiated into the criminal fraternity the crook resolves to cast aside his own name and take some other one. His main reason for doing this is quite obvious; he desires to conceal his identity as much as possible. Only a fool, he argues, would use his own name in criminal operations. What a sweet thing it would be for the cops if every criminal used his right name when he went adventuring! Likewise, he has other reasons for not traveling under his own name. Though he may have fallen from grace, he has qualms about using a family name that heretofore has not been dragged in the mud. He does not care for himself, but he does not want to bring disgrace on his father and mother, who are poor but respectable. Why drag them into his troubles?

"He decides to take a name, and while he is a criminal that name will suffice for his purpose. If he is caught no one will associate John Doe with John Smith. He will be arrested as John Doe, tried as John Doe and, if convicted and sentenced, he will go to the pen as John Doe, and no great harm will be done to anyone except to himself.

Sure to Find Him Out.

"He does not pause to consider that no matter how artfully he may try to conceal his real identity, the police will find him out. They will investigate his past, and when they once begin such an investigation they will be pretty sure to dig up a lot of knowledge concerning himself and his antecedents.

"After being in the game a while the crook finds that having only one alias is insufficient. He discovers the name he has been using is becoming entirely too familiar—especially to his enemies, the cops. If you are a crook, it does not pay to advertise; accordingly, he assumes another name and lays aside the first alias until people begin to forget it. In time the second alias outlives its purpose and it becomes necessary to take a third name. And this explains why criminals frequently have several aliases.

"All of these aliases he finds useful. It may not be convenient to use the name of Jim Jones in New York, but the name may do very well in another city in which he is unknown. He would prefer, many times, not to have a name at all, but since everybody must follow the custom and have a name, he must have one. Therefore he carries in his head several aliases, any one of which he may assume at a moment's notice. These names mean a lot to him. Some of them recall pleasant memories; others recall scenes that he would much prefer to forget. He remembers what Shakespeare said about calling a rose by any other name and it would smell as sweet. Though he would like to believe this, he knows the cops have a long memory for names. No matter how frequently he changes his name, the cops seem to be able to discover him and drag him from obscurity."

Freak Chickens Subject of Study by Zoologist

Philadelphia.—Chickens with two wings and four legs and even with four wings and four legs, and a duckling equally strangely constituted, were studied by Dr. F. E. Chidester, professor of zoology at West Virginia university, who described observations to the American Society of Zoology, meeting here.

The freakish external features of the birds were found to be coupled with odd internal structures. Four kidneys were found in some of the birds, double cloacae in all of them, and frequent variations in some of the digestive tubes. The gizzard, however, remained single, nor was there any evidence of duplicity in the heart or respiratory apparatus.

CONSTANTINOPLE MAY CHANGE NAME

City by the Bosporus Known by Many Titles.

Washington.—The suggestion has been made in Turkey that Constantinople be renamed for Kemal Pasha, president of the republic.

Constantinople has had many names at various times, says a bulletin of the National Geographic society from its Washington headquarters.

"Not for 400 years has Constantinople been Constantinople to the Turks. It is Stamboul to them. Some geographical title experts hold that Stamboul has been abbreviated by the Turks from Constantinople just as they abbreviated Thessalonica (Salonica) to Selanik. There are two other contentions. One is that Stamboul is a corruption of a phrase which the Turkish invaders heard the Greeks say, 'ees teen poleen,' literally 'to the city.' Another supposition is that 'islam,' meaning 'true believing,' and 'bul,' meaning 'copious,' have been welded together by the Turks into Stamboul, 'abounding in the true Moslem faith.'

"Emperor Constantine, for whom Constantinople is named, did not himself give it that name. On May 11, 330 A. D., Constantine called together a mass meeting in the newly completed hippodrome. It was a ceremony of rejoicing. A new city had been built, destined to succeed Rome as capital of the Roman empire for 11 centuries. At the high point of the hippodrome pageant Constantine dedicated the city to Christianity and named it Nova Roma.

"It was the Greeks who called it Constantinoupolis and finally it became Constantinople. The patriarch of the Greek church still signs his title 'bishop of Constantinople, New Rome,' but Nova Roma was forgotten. So was the original name, Byzantium for King Byzas, a local ruler, who first built a town on the Golden Horn peninsula.

"Turks have had other affectionate names for Constantinople just as Americans call New York, Father Knickerbocker. Sometimes the Turks call it Oummoudunia, 'the Mother of the World,' and sometimes Islambol, 'the City of Islam.' Another name is Der el Saadet, 'the City of Felicity.' Arabs call it by a name which is significant, El Farruch, 'the Earth Divider.'"

Government Railroad Reports $1,116,000 Loss

Washington.—While the railroads throughout the United States are enjoying their greatest period of prosperity, the only government-owned line—the Alaskan railroad—sustained a loss of $1,116,000 for the year, its general manager reported to the secretary of the interior recently.

Revenues of the road increased by $206,274 during the year, while operating expenses were cut $298,000.

Plans for the completion of the road and purchase of modern equipment call for an expenditure of approximately $12,000,000 during the next few years.

Here Are New Words, Take 'Em or Leave 'Em

London.—Mayfair has developed two new slang words which are now being worked overtime.

"Marabout" is one and it is used to describe anything old-fashioned or dowdy. It is a very elastic word, however, and at the Kit Cat club it was heard applied to everything from one's enemies to a drink of which someone did not approve. It is a noun.

The other word is a synonym of "marabout" and is used both as a noun and an adjective. It is "cagmag;" a variation is "cagmaggy."

Sand Heralds Knell of Artificial Lighting

Darrington, Wash.—Here's a mighty interesting incident, if true, vouched for by George Van Cleve which heralds the knell of artificial lighting. Recently Van Cleve plastered his basement, using material from a sand vein found near here. At all times the walls radiate light, the sand possessing radioactive properties. Samples of the sand vein are being analyzed by the geologists at the state university.

Anatomy of Hindu Lad Seems to Be All Wrong

Bombay.—Medical science is baffled by the strange case of a Hindu lad of thirteen who has just been admitted to the Osmania general hospital at Hyderabad, suffering from a knee joint complaint.

Outwardly nothing is wrong with the boy, but during a routine examination it was discovered that the organs of his chest are completely transposed, the liver being on the left side, heart on the right side, spleen opposite its normal position, while his stomach is in an inverse direction. His intestines lay coiled in the opposite direction.

The boy is healthy, and the phenomena is believed to have been due to twisting during the early weeks of his embryonic life.

Farmer Resler Speaks From Experience

Well known Minnesota man now fully recovered. Tells friends that Tanlac put him on his feet when all else failed

Anton J. Resler, R. F. D. 5, Owatonna, is widely known among Minnesota farmers. Many of these good friends were worried about his poor health and amazed at his quick and complete recovery. "For a year I suffered untold agony," he tells them. "The very odor of food sickened me and what little I could eat lay like a stone in my stomach.

"Every morning I would rise with that awful pain inside me, and I had neither heart nor strength for the day's work. The smallest job was a dreary drudge to me then. I grew thin, weak and sallow, and returned to the house exhausted each evening. I grew discouraged and knew I couldn't stand it much longer.

"Seeing what it had done for other sick folks, I gave Tanlac a trial and can truthfully say it gave me relief from the first. The awful weight and pains in my stomach soon disappeared and my appetite came back. I was able to sleep naturally again for the first time in a year. Now I'm strong and well and go through the hardest day's work with ease. Nothing bothers me now. Tanlac will always have a warm place in my heart."

What Tanlac did for Mr. Resler, it has done for many thousands of others. Over a hundred thousand grateful friends have written to tell us so. If you're in poor health, try Tanlac. Your druggist has it. Over 52 million bottles sold.

Merely Curious

Jones and his wife were on a fishing expedition. At the end of a trying, fishless day Jones brought things to a climax by falling into the water. Just as he crawled out, his wife appeared on the scene.

"Did you fall in?" she inquired, in surprise.

"No, no! Just crawled in to see which fish it was got away from me."

Preparing for a Career

"Why don't you get your boy Josh to help you?"

"I don't want to interrupt him," answered Farmer Corntossel. "There's good money in music these days and it 'ud be a shame to stop him while he's practicin' on the banjo."

Proof Enough

"I must tell you this story. I don't think I have told it to you before."

"Is it really a funny story?"

"Yes, awfully funny."

"Then you have never told it to me before!"—Kasper, Stockholm.

Thin Cream

Thin cream causes an unnecessary loss of skim-milk. It has a poor keeping quality. It costs the creamery more to handle and churn thin cream than it does richer cream.

Cream testing from 35 per cent to 40 per cent in the summer time and 30 per cent to 35 per cent in the winter is best for both producer and creamery. A Land O' Lakes cream should test at least 25 per cent. This is the official standard, and it is our wish that our patrons check up on their test and see if their test complies with the rules.

J. O. Johnson was thru error omitted from the November report. His amount of butterfat was 122 lbs.

J. P. Augustine heads the list by a big lead. Arno Steinhauer, who held first place for two months, is now second on the list, and C. A. Davis is a mighty close competitor, in third place. Davis is followed, in fact almost crowded, by Wm. Mehrkens, who ranks fourth.

J. D. Holst, deceased, holds fifth place for the third time. I am a strong believer in saying something regarding the passing of our good friend John Holst. The community of Holt deeply regrets hearing the news of his death, and I assure I am very sorry, not only because he was one of our biggest patrons, but also because he was a mighty good friend and neighbor.

Speaking of him as a dairyman he deserves much credit. A patron like he is a bigger asset to the community and the creamery than most of us realize, especially so when I tell you that he has the honor of being the only patron in the history of the creamery that delivered more than 4000 lbs. of butterfat in one year.

With a record like J. P. Augustine made for the month of December it would be unfair to both he and the Holt community if I didn't proclaim to the rest of the world what Mr. Augustine received in money out of butterfat delivered to the creamery from ten fresh and one stripper cow. Just figure for yourself what it amounts to and keep in mind the number of cows he milked.

Here it is:

532 lbs. butterfat. Monthly price for Land O'Lakes butterfat for December, 57c. This makes the neat sum of $303.24. Mr. Augustine found that the cost of the feed consumed by the cows during the month was $135, which left him a net profit of $168.24.

There is food for thought in the above record.

I have always been a believer in testing associations, but never as much as I am today. While attending the convention at Thief River Falls last week. Some very good charts were shown us of the different herds thruout the state, among them being some near home, such as the one at Thief River Falls.

If you realized the value of these testing associations, it would'nt be much of a trick to get the necessary number, which is 26, and have one here at Holt. I am almost convinced that we can get one started this spring so I wish those that want to get in on this, to leave their names with me at earliest date, when we are ready to go we will call a meeting and have Mr. Hanson, Prof. and organizer with the U. Extension Division meet with us. Let me take your name down first, who is next?

I am positive we can get the necessary number right here at home. If not, we will take those who wish to join and get the rest from some neighboring territory.

You might disagree with me when I say that to continue to milk a cow for 10 years and more without knowing what she is doing for you is not any worse than to run a business without keeping books. We do not realize how much a poor cow can lose for us in dollars and cents. Think it over and make up your mind to become a member of the first testing association in Marshall county. Patrons of the biggest creamery in the county, biggest from the standpoint of production, should be ready to sponsor the first testing association in the County.

Marshall County Fair Dates Fixed

At a recent meeting of officials of the Red River Valley Fair Circuit, the dates of the 21st annual fair at Warren were set at July 4, 5 and 6. Some of the amusement features to be seen at the fair have already been contracted for by officials of the association.

Boys' and Girls' Clubs At the Winter Shows

The boys' and girls' club division which has become an important part of the Winter Shows is expected, according to advance entries, to break all previous records in the number of livestock, potato, corn corn and poultry exhibits. A new feature of this department is a program of instruction and entertainment for each day of the week. There will be something doing every minute.

Here's part of the program:

Banquet Monday evening; poultry judging on Tuesday; leaders' conference and junior livestock showing contest on Wednesday; beef demonstration, sheep judging, talks on bees, calves, pigs, and baby chicks, and a program at the auditorium on Thursday; and poultry housing study hog judging, and corn and potato growing on Friday.

The junior club exhibitors are very fortunate in the support and encouragement which they receive in their work. The Winter Shows management is paying their railroad fare to and from Crookston, and the Red River Valley Dairyman's Association will pay $100 toward freight on dairy calves. This year special prizes were added by the Red River Valley Guernsey Breeders' Association for guernsey calf club members, and by the Red River Valley Holstein Breeders' Association for Holstein calf club members. Besides these cash prizes, there are six silver cups offered in the livestock and poultry divisions. Two free trips to the 1927 State Farm Boys' Camp, twelve free trips and expenses for potato winners, and eight trips in corn to the 1927 Northwest School of Agriculture Junior Short Course, are the special awards to corn and potato exhibitors.

Limited Amount of Pure Seed Is Now Available

Each year the Northwest experiment station distributes to pure seed several thousand bushels of pedigreed seeds which have been produced in the increase fields of the station farm, and this seed is now available. In order to give equal opportunity to all no seed has been reserved up to date of this announcement. Orders will be accepted and shipped in the order redeived. The station, however, reserves the right to reject orders from growers who do not have suitable fields or who habitually sell their entire crop on the open market without reserving a considerable portion for seed.

The purpose of the distribution it is explained, is to establish improved varieties among growers who will increase them for seed.

A. L. Carlson from here and Arvid Carlson from Middle River will leave to-morrow for Saint Louis, Chicago and other points in the east to buy up new stock for their stores. Enroute they will take in the style shows at Minneapolis and Saint Paul.

Auto Licence Time is Up on February 15.

Not much more than two weeks remain in which to get your 1927 auto license without paying a penalty. Feb. 15 is the last day applications may be filed without the penalty. If you are not in a hurry about getting your plates, and if you have your registration card and the necessary blanks, you can escape the penalty even if you wait and mail your application so it reaches the secretary of state on the last day. But if you want your plates right away, or if you do not have your card or your blanks, you may find the auto license bureau so rushed at the last minute that you cannot be accomodated and you may find the 25 cents a day penalty accruing while you wait.

—12—

Now here was a possibility hitherto unregarded; here something that might explain her singular attitude toward him. In saving Matteo she performed a duty, and by the very manner of it placed a barrier between herself and a lover of whom she had wearied.

Thus his vanity to complete the rout of his perspicuity, to convince him where cold reason failed.

"Agree?" he cried after that long pause. "Agree? By the Eyes of God! Am I a wooden image, or a purblind fool to refuse? I'll set a seal forthwith upon that contract." And with arms flung wide he swooped down upon her like a hawk upon a dove, and caught her to him.

She suffered it, stiff and cold with sudden terror and repressed loathing. He held her close and muttered foolish fondnesses. Then the awakened passion mounting, it became suffused with tenderness, and he told her of a future in which he should be the slave of her slightest whim, her devout and worshiping lover always.

At length she released herself from those lithe arms, and drew away from him, a hectic spot on either cheek, deep shame in her soul and a sense of defilement pervading all her being. He watched her, abashed, a little mistrustful even.

But when she had gained the door she paused, and there for an instant her iciness melted. Her laugh trilled softly across the chamber to him.

"Tomorrow!" she flung at him, and vanished, leaving him distracted.

CHAPTER VI

Perplexed, yet true to his adventurer's character, determined to follow his fortunes and accept such chances as there might be, Pantaleone took his measures against possible treachery, posted his men for the night so as to make quite certain that his prey did not escape until Madonna Fulvia and himself should be on their way to the nuptials, and that done went to bed to dream of a roseate future ennobled by ten thousand ducats.

Whilst he dreamt his aureate dreams, Madonna Fulvia below stairs was planning his destruction and another's. She indited a note, calculatedly enigmatic and brief that it might provoke curiosity and through this the response which she desired. She couched it in an odd mixture of curial Latin and the common language of the people.

"Magnificent (Magnifice Vir)—You are betrayed by one whom you hired to a betrayal. Before the Duomo of Castel della Pieve punctually at high noon tomorrow I will afford you proof of it if your illustrious magnificence is pleased to be there to receive it.

"Your servant (Servitrix vestra)
"FULVIA ORSINI."

"From the Rocca of Pievano this 20th day of January, 1503."

And under her signature she added the two words "Manu propria," which her self-respect seemed to demand of her. Then came the superscription: "To the Illustrious Prince, the Duke of Valentinois these

'Quickly
'Quickly
'Quickly"

As she she shook the pounce over the wet ink, she called Raffaele, who lay prone upon an eastern rug before the fire, kicking his heels in the air. Instantly he leapt to her summons.

She set her hands upon his shoulders, and looked steadily into his lovely face.

"Will you do a man's work for me, Raffaele? I have need of a man, and there is none here whom I can spare. Will you ride tonight to Cesare Borgia's camp at Castel della Pieve with this letter?"

"If that be all that is needed to prove myself a man, account it proven," said he.

"Good lad! Dear lad! Now, listen. There may be spies about the gate, and so it were best you went forth on foot from here. If you can slip out unseen, it will be better still. Then go down into the borgo to the house of Villanelli. Bid him lend you a horse for my service, but say no word even to him of whither you ride. Be circumspect and swift."

"Trust me, Madonna," said the lad, slipping the letter into the breast of his doublet.

"I do, else I should not charge you with this message. God watch over you! Send Mario to me as you go."

He went forthwith, and soon came Mario in answer to her summons.

"How is it with Giuberti tonight?" she asked the seneschal as he entered.

He shrugged despondently. "I doubt if the poor fellow will be alive by morning," he answered. "A miracle might save him. Nothing less. But miracles do not happen now."

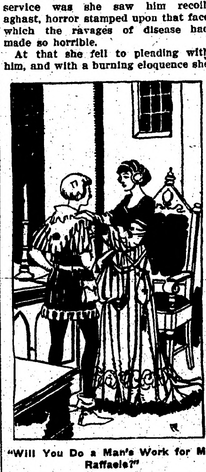
She paced slowly to the hearth, her face thoughtful, her eyes bent upon the ground. Thus she stood for a long moment, Mario waiting.

"Mario," she said at last, speaking very quietly, "there is a service I require of you this night—of you and Colomba."

"We are yours to command, Madonna," he replied.

Yet when she had told him what the service was she saw him recoil, aghast, horror stamped upon that face which the ravages of disease had made so horrible.

At that she fell to pleading with him, and with a burning eloquence she set forth the wrongs her House had suffered, spoke of the Orsini blood that had been shed to gratify Borgian ambition and to satiate Borgian vengeance, and so in the end won him to her will.



"Will You Do a Man's Work for Me, Raffaele?"

"Be it so, then, Madonna, since you desire it," he said, but he shuddered even as he spoke. "Have you the letter written?"

"Not yet. Come to me again soon, and it shall be ready."

In silence he departed, and she returned to the writing-pulpit. For a while she could not write, such was the tremor of her hand as a consequence of the agitation her interview with Mario had produced in her. Presently, however, she recovered her self-control, and thereafter for a spell there was no sound in the chamber, save the occasional splutter and crackle of the burning logs and the scratch of her busy quill.

Mario returned before she had finished, and stood waiting patiently until, rising, she flung down her pen, and proffered him the accomplished document.

"You understand?" she said.

"I understand, Madonna. God knows it is simple—terribly simple." And he looked at her with eyes of sorrow, conveying by his glance that what he found so terrible was that one so young and lovely should have conceived a notion so diabolical as this in which she had besought his aid.

"And you will instruct Colomba carefully so that there is no mistake."

"There will be none," he promised. "I have the cane, and I myself will prepare it. A thorn is easily procured."

"Let me have it, then, at daybreak. Bring it to my chamber. You will find me risen, and ready for a journey."

At that he was gripped by a fresh alarm. "You are not yourself to be the bearer of it?" he cried out.

"Whom else?" she asked him. "Could I demand such a service of any other?"

"Gesu!" he wailed. "Does my lord know of this?"

"Something of it. Enough of it. Not a word more now, Mario. Away with you, and see it done."

"Ah, but consider, Madonna, what you risk! Consider, Madonna, I beseech you."

"I have considered. I am an Orsini. Orsini have been strangled at Assisi, others are gaoled in Rome. Matteo's life is sought by this insatiable monster of revenge. I go there both to save and to avenge. I shall not fail."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

The Lesson

Camille Chauvin, the fashion expert, said in New York:

"The fashions change so rapidly that it is hard, even for me, to keep track of them. A girl complained to a young man the other evening:

"'Here I walked in the park and took tea with you this afternoon, and all the time the back of my frock was unbuttoned. Why didn't you button it up for me?'

"'Well,' said the young man, 'I didn't dare to. I thought perhaps it was the newest wrinkle. You see, I learned my lesson years ago. One day, back in 1914 or thereabouts, I offered to sew up the slit in a girl's skirt, and she told me to mind my own business or she'd tell her father.'"

Our Giant Airship Barn

ON THE prairie near Belleville, Ill., above the valley of the Mississippi river some miles east of St. Louis, is Scott field. This is Uncle Sam's army air base and air pilot school.

Here one is introduced to what unquestionably must be the world's record-breaking barn. This giant hangar is 810 feet long, 160 feet wide and 175 feet high. Its ponderous steel-reinforced and concrete-counterbalanced door, together with their electrically-controlled operating mechanism and tracks are said to weigh 750 tons per pair (there is one pair at either end) and require six minutes to open. The "catwalk" in this barn for airships is about 150 feet above the floor—a man swaying on it somewhat resembling a spider in a web.

Here one also sees many sorts of aircraft — aeroplanes, dirigible and semi-rigid dirigible airships, as well as supplies and repair parts therefor in abundance and variety. Nearby is a group of warehouses in which are stored stocks of "air" materials—ready for any emergency which might happen along unexpectedly.

To this great central air base many of Uncle Sam's air pilots are sent for training, it having gained the reputation of being the hardest and most heart-breaking air school in the world.

The hangars, barracks, storehouses, gas tanks, offices, officers' houses and commissary cover a quarter of a section. Headquarters' staff, faculty and students, commissioned officers and enlisted men are all under the command of a high officer of the service.

Harney Peak

HARNEY peak is the highest point between the Atlantic ocean and the Rocky mountains. It is located in the very heart of the famous Black hills of South Dakota.

This "king" mountain of the eastern half of these United States shoulders up above a mass of lesser heights which surround it and raises its barren, rocky crest to an elevation of 7,216 feet, or almost a mile and one-half above the level of the tides of the sea in a greeting to the stars in God's heaven.

The sides of this old sentinel of the north Middle West are studded with growths of timber and made up of rough, jagged ridges and peaks, gigantic and freakish-looking rocks, which the rains and the snows and the winds and the sun of centuries of time have eroded and fashioned into rare, odd and strange shapes. One large era is pointed and pinnacled in such a spectacular and grotesque manner that it has been dubbed "The Needles."

The lover of the rare in nature finds in the broad vista of landscape which spreads out in all directions from its summit like a map—peaks of lower altitude, pretty park-like places in fertile valleys, deep-sided canyons, rollicking streams, little glass-like lakes, picturesque towns, varied mining operations, the hog-back rim of the hills, prosperous farming communities, which stretch off into North Dakota, Wyoming and Nebraska, wonderfully impressive.

The Howard Eaton Trail

BORN in Pittsburgh, the late Howard Eaton—pioneer, sportsman, hunter, optimist and lover of God's great out-of-doors, answered the call of the West at an early age, when hunting buffalo and fighting hostile Indians were part of the day's work.

He died in 1922—a typical westerner, noted horseman and guide, unique in manner and speech, as favorably known in the famous hotels of New York city as in the great Rocky mountains of the West.

He reveled in the Yellowstone and laid out a horseback trail 157 miles long which traversed the wilds of this great natural wonderland, and yet touched all the major points of interest. This trail connected other paths and trails which penetrated regions inaccessible to vehicular traffic, making a total trail system of 700 miles, and is a great addition to the facilities for the public enjoyment of this great scenic domain. He traveled this trail scores of times.

After his death the park authorities assured preservation of the memory of this picturesque frontiersman by dedicating this trail to his memory.

Mr. Eaton was happiest perhaps when eastern city folk visited his ranch in the Big Horn mountains of Wyoming. He made them healthier and happier by thrusting them into such startlingly unusual surroundings that they promptly forgot their troubles and ills. He became, in a sense, a sort of official introducer of the West to the East. He loved to conduct a party of a hundred or more "tenderfeet," to whom his friendly hospitality held a strong appeal, through the strange mountain fastnesses anywhere between Canada and Mexico.

SECRETS IN THE OLD DRUM

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright, by W. G. Chapman.)

JIMMY SPENCE looked wistfully at his grandfather. He was only five years old, and did not understand many things, but he wondered especially why he must not speak to the old gentleman to whose house he went sometimes.

Nobody would tell him that, not even his grandmother, who was so kind to him. But nothing had ever stood between Josiah Spence and his happiness except his pride. He was called hard, but it was the hardness of a man ready to melt if the proper solvent could be applied.

If his only son, Tom, had been willing to say he was wrong, Josiah would have forgiven him. But the boy had never said he was wrong, not even when he was a baby. So the two had lived within three blocks of each other, and had not spoken for ten years.

Tom was married, and Josiah knew his wife quite well by sight, though he never recognized her. He knew that his wife and Tom's met at Tom's house, and when little Jimmy began to be brought to his home Josiah said nothing. But he would not recognize the lad, or admit his existence.

If Tom had only said he was wrong! Upstairs, in the attic, were Tom's playthings, the woolly horse, the broken soldiers, and the big drum with the slip in it. Sometimes Josiah went up and looked at them and thought of the days when Tom had been his little boy, before the stubborn nature developed in him.

The mother felt that it was Tom's duty to make up with father. Josiah was growing old. If Tom would say he had been to blame! But Tom refused, and it seemed likely that his father would go to his grave without a reconciliation.

She had hoped that little Jimmy's advent would change the situation. But Josiah, although secretly moved by the sight of the child, did not budge from his position. Let Tom say he had been wrong, and he would open his house to him and his wife. In despair, the mother made a final appeal to Tom.

"I won't say I was wrong, because I wasn't," was Tom's answer.

There matters rested, and the years began to go by. Little Jimmy was seven now, and still his grandfather had never spoken to him. Jimmy wondered more and more. Some day he would have to be told.

Josiah Spence was seventy-five. He was growing weaker, and he was softening with age. However, he did not soften toward Tom. But he longed for a reconciliation as only a stubborn nature longs for what it cannot obtain.

He was seated in the attic, where he often went now, thinking of the boy he had lost. He was looking over Tom's toys and shaking his head.

"He would never say he was sorry," he muttered. "Let him say he was sorry. If he said that I'd forgive him. Let him say it."

As he fingered the drum the convex edge, brittle with age, parted in his hands. The drum came apart in his hands. To the old man's astonishment he saw that the interior was filled with scraps of paper in a faded, childish writing. He recognized it as Tom's. He picked up one of them.

"Dere father," he read, "I am sorry that I broke the pane of glass yestidday."

Josiah started. The pane of glass! He remembered that as well as he remembered anything. Tom had thrown a stone and it had gone smash through the window. Tom had hung his head when taxed with it, but had refused to say he had been wrong.

Josiah picked up another. "Dere father," it ran. "I am sorry that I tor my trousis yestidday."

Josiah did not remember that. Tom must have torn a good many pairs of "trousis" in his boyhood.

"Dere father," another read. "I am sorry that I got a bad repot from skool."

That Josiah remembered. Tom had done very badly that term, and he had been wilfully defiant. He had even bragged of it.

Josiah picked up scrap after scrap. There must have been fifty of them, covering almost the entire period of Tom's boyhood. The latest of them, in the firm writing of a young fellow of nineteen, read thus:

"Dear Father: I have never been able to say that I was sorry for anything, and I am unable to do so now. I want to. But I can't. Perhaps our natures are pretty much the same. Perhaps you would be able to understand if you were ever to see this. But you never will.

"You think me idle and worthless because I threw over that position in the bank. It is not that, father. I am throwing it up because I mean to start out for myself in the electrical business. I would have told you if you had been willing to listen to reason. But you would have it I was wrong. And so I have said nothing. For having wounded you I am sorry."

Josiah laid down the drum and put back the scraps of paper. Tom had made good. Tom had been right. And that was the one time where he should not have said he was sorry. He, Josiah, had been wrong there.

The tears came into the eyes as he thought of the ten years of loneliness. Ten years of missed happiness, and not many more to come. At seventy-five one does not look forward to a great deal. The old man wept.

Presently, moved by an uncontrolable impulse, he took up a pen and paper. "Dear Tom, I am sorry for everything," he wrote, and thrust the scrap of paper into the drum.

He glued the broken ends together lightly and went out with bowed head.

The next day a wonderful thing happened to little Jimmy. His grandfather gave him a drum.

It was so amazing that he was quite incoherent when he got home with his treasure. He showed it to his mother.

"What did he say?" she asked, excitedly.

"Nothing, mamma. He just put it in my hand. Look what a fine drum! Give me something to hit it with, mamma!"

That evening, when the little boy was asleep in bed, she told her husband and showed the drum to him. Tom looked and looked at it.

"It's my old drum!" he cried. "I recognize it. Jean, do you suppose the old man means anything by it?"

"We can't tell, dear," she answered. "Oh, Tom, if only you could say you are sorry."

"And I'd give everything in the world if I could, Jeanie," answered her husband. "But I can't. It's a physical impossibility for me now, because I've never said it. I used to try to when I was a boy, and never could."

"Perhaps your father is the same way," answered Jean.

"Well, there seems to be nothing we can do," said Tom. "But I wonder why he gave Jimmy that drum?"

He took it in his hands, and as he did so the glueing came apart. The drum parted; out dropped the little heap of old letters. Tom stared at them speechlessly as the memory of them came back to him.

"What is this, dear?" asked his wife. "Look! 'Dere father, I am sorry I sat on yore hat.'"

"I wrote them," answered Tom grimly. "I used to slip them in there. I couldn't say it to his face."

"Why, they are all confessions, Tom," said Jean. "And who wrote this. 'Dear Tom, I am sorry for everything'?"

Tom took the paper in his father's writing and looked at it. Gently he laid it down. When Jean looked at him she saw that his eyes were full of tears.

"I guess we were both the same after all," he said.

"Tom, dearest—"

"I'm going to him."

And, twenty minutes later Josiah Spence, implacable, unswerving, opened the door, to see Tom and his wife standing there together. He controlled his emotion with a violent effort, and waited. But the words died on Tom's lips. Then Jean stepped forward.

"He can't say it, but I can," she said. "He's sorry. Tom, aren't you sorry, dear?"

Tom nodded.

"And you, father? Aren't you a tiny little bit sorry?" she continued, to Josiah.

"Sorry? For what, madam?" demanded the old man.

Jean wasn't feazed. "Never mind your tongue—just nod," she said. "You're both the same, you men. Now —aren't you a tiny bit sorry?"

"Not in the least," Josiah answered —and nodded. And with a cry of happiness Jean drew the two men's hands together.

Jimmy is nine now, and he has almost forgotten the days when his grandfather did not speak to him. They are the best of friends and spend hours together in the fields and countryside. Then there are the happy evenings by the fireside, when grandfather tells wonderful stories of Tom's childhood. On the wall hangs the drum. It is cracked and broken, but sometimes grandfather will take it down and show Jimmy how Tom used to march when he was a little boy of his own age.

Superstition Slow to Pass Away in England

The recently reported appearance in Berkshire of Herne the Hunter and his ghostly pack of hounds, who, since the days of Good Queen Bess, have haunted the old Royal forest of Windsor, recalls to the matter of fact modern public the Shakespearean truism that "There are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in our philosophy."

Herne the Hunter was a forest ranger in the royal hunting domain, and, disgracing himself, was executed by order of his Tudor sovereign. Since then, each succeeding reign has witnessed his return to the "shades of the moon," generally before danger threatens the royal house or the realm. Shakespeare mentions the ghostly huntsman in one of his plays.

It is a curious coincidence that a West country newspaper reports that in Devon had been heard quite recently the ghostly beating of Drake's famous drum, which reposes in his old Devonshire mansion home of Buckland abbey. Drake's drum is only heard when danger threatens England. It was heard by many English naval officers in Scapa Flow in the month of August, 1914.—Weekly Scotsman.

Drink Water If Kidneys Bother

Take a Tablespoonful of Salts if Back Pains or Bladder is Irritated

Flush your kidneys by drinking a quart of water each day, also take salts occasionally, says a noted authority, who tells us that too much rich food forms acids which almost paralyze the kidneys in their efforts to expel it from the blood. They become sluggish and weaken; then you may suffer with a dull misery in the kidney region, sharp pains in the back or sick headache, dizziness, your stomach sours, tongue is coated, and when the weather is bad you have rheumatic twinges. The urine gets cloudy, full of sediment, the channels often get sore and irritated, obliging you to seek relief two or three times during the night.

To help neutralize these irritating acids; to help cleanse the kidneys and flush off the body's urinous waste, get four ounces of Jad Salts from any pharmacy here. Take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days, and your kidneys may then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help flush and stimulate sluggish kidneys; also to neutralize the acids in the system so they no longer irritate, thus often relieving bladder weakness.

Jad Salts is inexpensive; cannot injure and makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink.

LOST FORTUNES LYING IN BANKS

Owners and Heirs Are Difficult to Find.

New York.—A neat fortune in unclaimed savings lies in the vaults of New York banks awaiting trace of depositors.

The pennies of "floaters" the world over, from diverging sources and in varying amounts, add to the total which, in one bank alone, has climbed to six figures.

Hundreds of depositors have visited banks never to return. They have left their savings and gone, possibly to death, without leaving record of their moves.

Owners and heirs to this fortune are hard to find, says Herbert K. Twitchell, president of the Seaman's Bank for Savings, which, in 100 years of business, has 2,536 dormant accounts totaling $296,938.67. The task, however, is a never-ending one and through a department, instituted for the purpose, constant search is made and every possibility of a claimant exhausted.

The Seaman's bank is one of many which have similar accounts whose depositors have not been heard of in 20 years or more. After this lapse the accounts become "legally dormant," interest no longer is paid and the banks have use of the money, but not for individual gain.

Up the winding Bowery, in the twilight of the elevated, wander ageless Chinese, men of bearded styles, hatless foreign women, pale, old-faced children. Such is the clintele of the Bowery Savings bank where the dormant accounts total $100,000.

Once in this parade, said a bank official, was Mary Ellin, a quaint old char-woman, seventy years old. She had forgotten some of her accounts and was found to have $12,000 deposited with the bank under four different names.

Science May Open Up Fuel Fields of West

Washington. — Extensive lignite fields west of the Mississippi, an area now largely coal importing, may be made commercially productive as fuel by a cheap, carbonizing process developed by the bureau of mines.

The Department of Commerce disclosed in a statement that the bureau has perfected a method of carbonizing raw lignite into briquetted char fuel and the product is believed capable of meeting industrial demands.

Lignite deposits make up nearly one-third of the total solid fuel resources of the country, but as it is mined has insufficient heat units to make its wide use practicable. If the bureau's new process is applied, it is held Western regions now importing coal may be able to utilize the product of their own areas.

Extensive lignite fields lie in North Dakota, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado and Texas. The Commerce department views these deposits of such enormous potential economic value as is seldom recognized. Up to the present the relatively cheap rates on transporting Eastern coal via the Great Lakes has retarded development of the full possibilities of lignite.

Find Bronze-Age Bones in Thames Bed

London.—Skulls and bones of what are believed to have been lake-dwellers of the Bronze age, approximately 2000 B. C., have been found in the bed of the Thames at Sunbury, and Sir Arthur Keith, famous anthropologist pronounces them at least 4,000 years old.

The bones were found about twenty feet below the river bed while excavations were being made for the construction of a new lock, and they consist of a woman's skull; thighbone of a woman about five feet one inch in height; man's left shinbone, and man's right armbone.

The shinbone is flattened with what the scientists call the "squatter's facet," showing the man passed much of his time in a crouching position.

Bones of oxen, horses, pigs and red deer also were found, as well as six antlers.

Sir Arthur says the human bones doubtless were those of the lake, or pile, dwellers of the Celtic pre-Roman race of the late Neolithic or early Bronze age.

Bad Times Silence Song of the Volga Boatmen

Astrakhan, Russia. — "The Song of the Volga Boatmen" is no longer heard along the great river, where it originated. Formerly the Volga was a stream of romance and laughter, covered with fleets of pleasure and cargo boats, but ten years of war, famine and revolution have changed all that. The caviar and fishing industries have suffered grievously and the hundreds of thousands of villagers who formerly drew their life from the river have turned to farming and other pursuits.

"OLD HEZ" COAXES FISH WITH VERSE

Beguiles Finny Tribe With Talk and Rhyme.

Arkansas City, Ark.—Old Hez says he has never pulled a bass from a stream with half the thrill he has when he trails flint spalls along the ground to the remains of an old Indian camp and there digs up arrowheads, axes, spearheads and mauls used by America's early settlers.

Who is Old Hez?

He's an authority on both bass and Indian relics—B. F. Lloyd of Arkansas City, Kans., former newspaper man, printer and painter by trade, fly fisherman by profession, with an insatiable hobby for collecting Indian relics.

Among fly fishermen Mr. Lloyd is known as Old Hez, a dean of bass fishermen in this part of the country. Up and down the streams of Kansas, Arkansas, Missouri, Oklahoma, Illinois and Indiana Old Hez with his fishing equipment is a familiar figure. He has taught scores of young men how to trick wary bass from their lairs; he has caught fish both big and small in winter and summer.

Beguiles Them With Verse.

"Talk to 'em. Coax 'em along a little," is the advice of Old Hez on catching fish. "I know their language, and when I step into the stream I begin talking to my fish. All the while I'm pulling him in I'm talking to him, sometimes even in rhymes."

Here's the conversational part of Mr. Lloyd's well-known bass poem, "Song of the Wild," with which he beguiles his fish, with a "Come on, grandpa, come on, and quit your foolin'," thrown in for a refrain:

Good morning, grandpa, good morning—
Hey? Huh? Not so well, did you say?
Why, certainly, if your stomach's a-gnawing,
Take a cathartic. I assure, 't will allay.

Come out from the brush where the fighting is fair,
Out in the open, away from your lair
And measure your wits with me, I dare,
For this is Old Hez, Old Hez of Adair.

Now he turns from the old log den,
As he lunges for freedom on high,
Down he goes and makes for the moss ledge—then
Is stopped in the twink of an eye.

When the bass is finally outwitted, "Old Hez" always says: "I thank you."

Mr. Lloyd has been fishing since he was a youngster and he's sixty-six years old now. In his words he's the "youngest old man that ever followed a stream." He comes by his fishing skill naturally, for he is the son of a well-known fly fisherman, the late Capt. R. W. Lloyd, of the Eighty-third Indiana infantry, in the Civil war.

Much as he loves fishing, however, it's not of his angling exploits that "Old Hez" talks of by the hour now, but of flint and rocks, Indian arrowheads and tomahawks. It's not his fishing rod that he carries out on most of his trips to the river now but a pointed cane with which to brush leaves aside and dig into the earth.

Keen on Indian Relics.

Down by the river he goes—the Walnut river, that flows through the flint hills of Kansas—but not to cast bait to hungry fish. Sometimes he walks miles, sometimes he sits by the hour staring at the ground in all directions or digs his way into an old cave in the rocks. When he returns, it is not with the usual string of fish, but with a hatful of flint or sandstone or agate made by Indians before the white man came.

For "Old Hez" has developed a passion for collecting Indian relics and he boasts that his collection of 1,309 pieces is one of the finest in this part of the country and that he has found some of the rarest specimens of Indian implements in existence.

Almost two sides of his bedroom are hung with cardboard plaques on which arrowheads, spearheads, tomahawks, axes and other things are strung with copper wire. On the floor are piled heavier pieces, such as mauls, corn bowls, tanners and pestles.

The prize of all his possessions is a 50-pound fire bowl, the like of which Mr. Lloyd says he has not found in any Indian collection outside his own.

Sheep to Be Raised on Deserted Island

Onancock, Va.—Watts Island, in Tangier sound, deserted some years ago because the erosion caused by tides was making it unsafe for habitation, is coming into its own again. Once a prosperous community of fishermen and truckmen growing vegetables for Baltimore markets, it degenerated into a wilderness of brambles. Then the tides cut in on the highlands until it was bisected. Since then the two islands have been known as Big Watts and Little Watts.

One man feels the tides will not wipe out the island. Charles Hardenburg of Jersey City has taken up a home on Little Watts in the deserted lighthouse and has gone into the raising of sheep on the big island. The island contains 250 acres of fertile land and it is the intention of Mr. Hardenburg to stock it with high-grade sheep. The work has begun.

Riga, N. Y.—Wild dog hunting is the leading sport here. Several packs of wild dogs have wandered through the countryside, attacking domestic animals and even chasing people.

SEES POVERTY ENDED BY ATOM

Scientist Makes Glowing Prediction for Future.

Philadelphia.—If the atom nuclei, which speeds through the air at the rate of 1,200 miles per second, could be separated from the electrons, which it gathers during the flight, and tightly packed together in one solid mass, the weight alone of one cubic inch of such matter would exceed 100,000,000 tons, Dr. Karl Frederich Schlissel, one of Germany's most eminent scientists, touring the United States, and incidentally attending the sessions of the American scientists here, said in an exclusive interview.

"The time is not far distant, only a few hundred years, in the manner in which science measures time," said Doctor Schlissel, "when, with liberation of the atom, man will forget there ever was such a thing as poverty and suffering. As a matter of fact, he will have no worries, won't even have to work."

"It is common knowledge," said Doctor Schlissel, "that alchemy years ago ceased to be a mere superstition, because of the achievements thus far recorded by science in the ascertainment of radio-active substances.

"For example let us take a lump of coal. Science has ascertained that the lump is simply an incomprehensibly large number of electrical particles clustering together.

"Now if these particles in that lump of coal could be liberated and controlled. They would provide vastly more power than would be needed to operate all the machinery ever constructed throughout the whole world.

"Again, for example, if the hydrogen contained in two teaspoonfuls of water were converted into helium, it is reasonable to believe that 200,000 kilowatt hours of energy would be liberated.

"It is my honest conviction along scientific lines that the time is coming, say in about 200 years, when the energy of the atom will be so concentrated as to do the work of the entire human race."

Plant Life Is Traced to North Pole Origin

Philadelphia.—The evolution of modern plants and of modern climates began together at the North pole some six or seven million years ago, when the last of the dinosaurs were still lumbering about the earth. It continued with increasing speed through the tertiary age, which followed, until the comparatively recent time of the glaciers. It was during this time, according to the record of the rocks, that the plants of the earth began to show evidences of being divided into growth zones influenced by climate; until then all the earlier plants were of types such as now grow in the tropics, and they were distributed evenly over the whole earth, indicating the prevalence of a uniformly warm climate.

At the meeting of the American Botanical society here Dr. Arthur Hollick of the New York Botanical Garden outlined the evidence for his theory that the first temperate zone plant life evolved in the polar regions. The higher forms of flowering plants, he said, are primarily adaptations to a climate of alternating warm and cold seasons, and their final invasion of the still uniformly warm tropics has been recent and is a matter of competition with the plants they found there rather than a response to a climatic urge.

It is in the tropics today that the only relics of the vegetation of an earlier world, the cycads and similar plants, remain to contest with the late-coming modern plants for a foothold. Plant fossils of tertiary age from the tropics are very little different from the living plants of the same regions, whereas tertiary fossils from the regions of the earth where winter comes show evidences of radical and rapid evolution.

Stopped the Show

New York.—Teddy, a black cat, which has spent nine years in the Metropolitan opera house boiler room, went on the stage during a performance of "Turandot" and stopped the show.

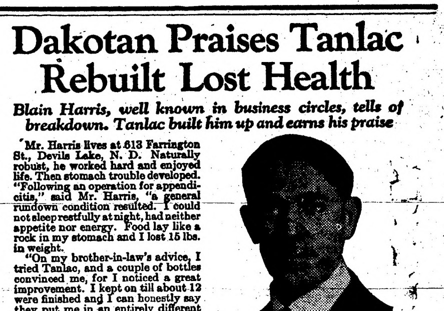
Chinese Use Razors, but Not to Shave

Shanghai.—If one in ten of China's 400,000,000 population passed ten minutes a day shaving, the aggregate time consumed would represent in round numbers 760 years per shave.

But the Chinese wastes no time in shaving his face. He is a beardless individual and the only use he has for a razor is in the process of hair cutting.

Shears or clippers will not do, and one of the common sights in any Chinese city street is an itinerant barber with a razor, resembling a diminutive butcher's cleaver, engaged in reducing a coolie's head to the semblance of a billiard ball. The rest of the paraphernalia consists of a pan or bucket of water, a wooden stool and a towel.

Soap or lather has no place in the operation, but the customer comes forth looking as though he had been sandpapered and polished.



Dakotan Praises Tanlac Rebuilt Lost Health

Blain Harris, well known in business circles, tells of breakdown. Tanlac built him up and earns his praise

Mr. Harris lives at 613 Farrington St., Devils Lake, N. D. Naturally robust, he worked hard and enjoyed life. Then stomach trouble developed. "Following an operation for appendicitis," said Mr. Harris, "a general rundown condition resulted. I could not sleep restfully at night, had neither appetite nor energy. Food lay like a rock in my stomach and I lost 15 lbs. in weight.

"On my brother-in-law's advice, I tried Tanlac, and a couple of bottles convinced me, for I noticed a great improvement. I kept on till about 12 were finished and I can honestly say they put me in an entirely different condition. Tanlac gave me a ravenous appetite, put my stomach and liver in normal condition again and steadied my nerves. I sleep regularly, too. I'm in splendid health now, have gained back my lost weight, and as I took no other remedy, the whole credit belongs to Tanlac."

If overwork or neglect have run you down, try Tanlac. It is nature's own tonic, made of herbs, barks and roots. Your druggist has it. Over 52 million bottles sold.

Thin Cream.

Thin cream causes an unnecessary loss of skim-milk. It has a poor keeping quality. It costs the creamery more to handle and churn thin cream than it does richer cream.

Cream testing from 35 per cent to 40 per cent in the summer time and 30 per cent to 35 per cent in the winter is best for both producer and creamery. A Land O' Lakes cream should test at least 25 per cent. This is the official standard, and it is our wish that our patrons check up on their test and see if their test complies with the rules.

HUGE GROWTH IN SCHOOL SAVINGS

New York.—School savings in the United States for the year 1924-1925 increased in aggregate bank balances by $5,500,000, with a growth of 630,000 in the total number of pupils participating, it is shown in reports made to the American Bankers Association, which declares that the returns encourage belief in the permanence of school savings as a part of the educational program in the public schools.

During the year the number of reporting school savings systems increased from 683 in 742 districts to 760 in 1,557 districts, the number of schools from 9,080 to 10,163; the number of pupils participating from 2,236,226 to 2,869,497, the deposits from $14,991,535.40 to $16,961,560.72 and the bank balances from $20,435,144.64 to $25,913,431.15, says W. E. Albig, in charge of the Association's savings activities.

Since 1920, the first year for which comprehensive statistics are available, the number of schools having school savings banking has increased 271.4 per cent; the enrollment in school savings districts 278.9 per cent, participants 520.2 per cent, deposits 506.1 per cent and bank balances 516.8 per cent.

J. P. Augustine Elected Director

J. P. Augustine was elected as the local director of the Holt unit of the Thief River Valley Cooperative Poultry Association at their annual meeting held here last Thursday. He succeeds R. A. Lighting Pullman Cars Candles were largely used from 1865 to 1874, oil from 1875 to 1890 and Pintsch gas from 1891 to 1909. The first electrically lighted train was the Pennsylvania Limited, June, 1887, a dynamo engine being placed in the baggage car. Later, along about 1898, individual axle lighting generators were developed.

Wanted Her to Shrink

Little Ellen heard it explained that "shrink" means "to grow smaller." A few evenings later we went to a movie and in front of Ellen's seat sat a very stout woman. After squirming around for some time in her seat, trying to look past the wide shoulders of the woman in front, Ellen leaned over and whispered. "Please, lady, do you mind shrinking a little so I can see the picture?"

SCHOOL NOTES

The fifth and sixth graders finished their hygiene booklets last Friday. These booklets both state and illustrate the most important health rules we should follow.

The sixth graders have just completed a study of Italy, of which some interesting topics on the important cities were given by the pupils.

The Spelling average, after a period of lowness, is up again. Both fifth and sixth graders had the same average for the last week, 99 3-13.

The eighth grade citizenship class are busy making charts illustrating "How Laws Are Made" and "The Departments of Our National Government." By these charts each bill is traced by arrows through the Capitol building and to the White House, where it is either signed or vetoed by the President.

The seventh grade geography class have just begun the regional study of Asia. The Asiatic tundra, the Siberian wheat belt, the Great Evergreen Forest, and the Asiatic steppes and plateaus have been studied so far. The future possibilities of each region, together with their present problems, are taken up in conjunction with the ordinary geographical facts.

The first and second grades have a Lincoln log-cabin sand table.

Miss Bertha Larson visited the school on Monday.

Dreyfus Is Now Living in Peace

"Bordereau" Case, Involving French Officer, Shook Nation Generation Ago.

Paris.—Twenty years have gone by since Alfred Dreyfus, condemned by a court-martial in Paris in December, 1894, to spend the rest of his life in Devil's island for alleged treason, resumed his place in civilized society, his rank in the army and his status as a free man innocent of the charge leveled against him.

Today Lieutenant Colonel Dreyfus, retired, wearing in his lapel the rosette of commander of the Legion of Honor, is living the quietest kind of a life in a sumptuous apartment in the Parc Monceau quarter with his wife, who stood by him when half of France was howling for his blood. He receives few visitors. "Tiger" Clemenceau, France's organizer of victory, is perhaps the last survivor of this courageous group who defended Dreyfus a generation ago.

Maitre Labori, the lawyer who acted as his counsel at the peril of his own life; Emile Zola, the novelist who went to prison for his part in the defense; Colonel Picquart, who risked his career for taking the part of the accused officer, and Juares, the great Socialist orator who stirred the chamber of deputies and the country by impassioned appeals, are dead.

Stirred Whole Nation.

For twelve years this man stirred French passions to depths such as the country had not known since the revolution. The "affaire Dreyfus" dominated every aspect of public life. It caused governments to topple and made France almost a nullity in the political history of Europe. It led to a recrudescence of royalism which threatened the life of the republic. Political parties were divided and families were split. Several persons lost their lives in the almost daily clashes between the factions into which the nation was divided.

Previous to his arrest as a traitor Captain Dreyfus was merely an obscure staff officer, disliked in the army because he was a Jew. He was born in Mulhausen, in Alsace, in 1859 and was twelve years old when the armies of Kaiser Wilhelm's grandfather swooped down over the Rhine and incorporated Alsace and Lorraine in the newly born German empire. His parents sacrificed their patrimony rather than live under German rule. Young Alfred was just old enough to remember and was one of the many thousand Alsatians who swore never to rest until the lost provinces were restored to France.

Nevertheless he was not popular in the military academy of St. Cyr, always because of his religion and race.

"Bordereau" Comes to Light.

In the fall of 1894 a document, known later as the "Dreyfus bordereau," or memorandum, supposed to have been mysteriously stolen from the German embassy, was handed over to the French secret service and was delivered to the ministry of war. It purported to be a communication from a French staff officer offering important army secrets to a foreign power. Officials thought they saw an astonishing resemblance between the handwriting of the "bordereau" and that of Captain Dreyfus. So-called handwriting experts supported this view and Dreyfus was arrested.

His condemnation was a foregone conclusion. His enemies occupied the highest posts in the army and the government. By a unanimous verdict the court-martial condemned him to degradation and to detention for life in the penal settlement off the coast of South America known as Devil's island.

But powerful friends were working for him. Zola, in his famous letter, "J'Accuse," denounced the real culprits. The sentence was reduced to ten years by a second court-martial and President Loubet gave Dreyfus a free pardon.

Dreyfus, however, insisted that what he wanted was not a pardon but rehabilitation. A final session of the Appeal court decided in July, 1906, that he had been wrongly condemned. He was reinstated in the army, advanced to the rank of major and went through the war as such, retired after the armistice with the rank of lieutenant colonel and membership in the Legion of Honor.

Put Net Under This Tree to Catch Eggs

Chanute, Kan.—Mrs. A. H. Turner has a hen and a problem. Her biddy, a Rhode Island Red, makes its nest on a limb of a tree. It lays an egg every day, but the egg falls to the ground and is broken. Mrs. Turner says it is impossible to induce biddy to take a nest nearer the ground.

Find Cash and Gems in Safe Bought as Junk

South Amboy, N. J.—Jewels, securities and cash worth $75,000 were found by Joseph and Frank Hyer, blacksmiths, of South Keyport, stuffed in a rusty safe they had bought as old iron. The Hyers bought the safe from a farmer and forced it with a crowbar. The safe was crammed with stocks, bonds, checks, jewels, unset stones and cash.

LAST OF THE SIDEWHEELERS AT MEMPHIS IS DESTROYED

Flames End Career of Kate Adams, Sole Survivor of Type on Lower Mississippi.

Memphis, Tenn.—Flames ended the romantic career of the Kate Adams, majestic river steamer here, and removed from the lower Mississippi the last sidewheeler to ply the great stream in southern waters.

The "Kate," as she was familiarly called, beloved of river folk and pet of plantation workers along her course, perished as two of her predecessors of the same name before her and left a ruin of twisted metal beams at the water's edge, to mark her final anchorage. The cause of the fire was undetermined. She burned quickly, and some of the crew had narrow escapes. To plantation people, white and negro alike, the Kate was a living creature, whose sonorous whistle, audible as far as twenty miles inland, was the signal of joyous cries. Straightening from their tasks at the sound of the boat's melodious call, the black cotton pickers with grinning faces would shout across the field:

"Yer comes de lovin' Kate!"

As the palatial two-stacker, trailing black smoke in twin clouds nosed toward her landing with passengers and cargo, inhabitants of the little river communities would turn out as for a holiday.

The Kate was built in 1898 and until 1922 was a mail boat. For 15 years she ran twice a week from Memphis to Arkansas City, and her reputation for clock-like regularity became traditional.

In the last few weeks of her service the film producers of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" leased her for use in their movie scenes.

The boat was 240 feet long, with a 50-foot beam, and was valued at $125,000, but river experts said she could not be replaced for less than twice that amount. A small part of the loss was covered by insurance.

The Kate Adams was owned by the Delta Packet company of Pittsburgh, of which Capt. Tom Reeves is president. Except for two years in service on the Upper Ohio river, which ended early last fall, the steamer was operated on the lower Mississippi and its tributaries. She was built at Jeffersonville, Ind.

Housewives Dump Clams in Cellars to Catch Mice

Portland, Maine.—Mrs. O. W. Creamer of Cushing, Maine, left a basket of clams in her cellar overnight. Next morning she found three dead mice held firm and fast between the shells of as many clams. Mrs. Creamer told her neighbor and the neighbor obtained similar results. Now all the Cushingites whose homes are troubled with mice are putting clams on their trail and the mouse-trap business is experiencing a slump.

THREE IN THE PLOT

By THOMAS J. SMITH

(Copyright, by W. G. Chapman.)

"THE trouble with you, my dear, is that you have a temperament, said John Stevens to his pretty wife Lillian.

"Oh, I wish I knew whether you loved me," she sobbed. "I wish I knew."

"You don't think I am a liar, do you?" inquired her husband, biting off the end of a cigar.

"No, but you just can't help changing. I know you're changed. You haven't told me you cared for me for a whole week."

"When I change I'll let you know," said John calmly. He took his hat and went up to Lillian to kiss her good-by. But she repulsed him.

"I don't want you to kiss me ever again," she said. "I know I'm nothing to you. You can go and leave me. Maybe there will be somebody who will care for me some day."

"Well, if you find him, don't forget to tell me," answered her husband, letting himself out of the door.

His face grew rather serious as he went down the street. He was devoted to his wife of two years' standing, but as he had said, Lillian had a temperament. She was forever imagining things. She was the type of a woman who would never be quite happy. He was puzzled; he wished he knew what to do to make her life happier and more serene. Yet the only thing seemed to be to wait and hope that in time Lillian would come to see things differently.

"I wish I had Jim's advice," he muttered. "I've half a mind to go and talk things over with him. Jim understands women, and he understands Lillian—he ought to."

Jim Davis and Lillian had been engaged for nearly a year before John Stevens butted in and won the girl away. Jim had never resented it, and the two men had become fast friends. It was a curious situation, and only the strongest friendship could have endured it. But John never had the least doubt of his friend's loyalty.

When he had gone Lillian sat down and gave way to a flood of tears. She did not believe her husband cared for her. Because he did not tell her so every minute of the day, as he had done when they were married seemed an infallible proof to her.

"I'll make him realize what he has lost," she said.

She wished that she had some woman friend in whom she could confide. But since her marriage she had given up nearly all her friends. Who was there? Jim, who had adored her, Jim whom she ought to have married. With a sudden impulse she went to the telephone.

"Jim," she called. "I am in great trouble. Won't you come round and see me and help me?"

"Sure, Lily," answered Jim.

He came into the room half an hour later, big, stalwart, honest-looking. She offered him a chair.

"What's the trouble, my dear?" he asked.

"John doesn't love me any more," sobbed Lillian.

"Oh, I guess you've got that wrong," said Jim. "I know he does."

"No, he doesn't. He thinks n-now he's g-got me it doesn't matter how he acts. And I'm going to give him the lesson of his life. And I want you to help me."

"Well, I don't mind playing a trick on old John," said Jim. Spell it out, Lily."

"I want you to pretend to elope with me. I mean to leave a letter saying I've run away with you. Then we'll just go to the station together about the time he's coming home, and if he c-c-cares for me, he'll follow and bring me back."

"And shoot me, maybe," said Jim meditatively.

"Of course, if you're afraid," said Lillian scornfully.

"No, I'm not afraid," answered Jim. "But suppose he doesn't come for us?"

"Then I shall take the train to mother, and you'll go home, and I'll never, never see or speak to John again as long as I live."

Jim reflected. "It's a sort of low game to play," he soliloquized. "Lily, dear, are you dead sure you've got John correctly? You know he isn't much of a hand to show his feelings, but he's got 'em, all right."

"I know he doesn't care for me, and I'm going to show him that he's lost me."

"All right," said Jim finally. "Now about the details. John gets back about—?"

"Half-past five."

"Suppose we start at five, then, and wait at the station till seven. That will give him time to catch us. Say in your letter that we are leaving on the six-forty for—where do you say?"

"San Francisco," gulped Lillian.

"That's good enough. And I guess you'd better have a real trunkful of clothes, in case he doesn't come and you have to go to your mother."

Jim went away, leaving Lillian in a flood of tears. Outside the house he stopped and shook his head regretfully.

At half-past five John arrived home with a box of fresh candy, to find Lillian gone. He read the letter upon the table. She was gone with the man who had always loved her, she said, and she had made the biggest mistake in life in marrying John. The train for San Francisco left at six-thirty, and he needn't try to find where she had gone, because he would never see her again.

John put the letter down calmly and looked at his watch. Then he took down the railroad guide. There was no train for San Francisco at six-thirty.

John washed and did his hair, put on a clean collar, selected his favorite walking stick, and went into the street and took a car to the station.

At six o'clock Lillian paced the platform beside Jim in anguish. What would John do? She was beginning to grow afraid. She had never seen John angry, except once, when he kicked an impudent plumber out of the house. He had seemed terrible then. What would he do? There might be murder.

She went up to Jim. "I think you had better go," she said. "You aren't really necessary, you know. John won't know who the man was for sure. If you stay here he may shoot you."

Jim looked scared. "You think so, Lillian?" he asked in a hollow voice.

"It would be terrible," said Lillian, sobbing.

"I have a hunch John won't come," said Jim.

"What do you mean?"

"He must have got your letter an hour ago, almost. It's twenty-five past six. I am sure he isn't coming. Probably he is glad to be free."

"Jim!"

"And you're happy to be rid of him," continued Jim. "He's a worthless scamp. Lily, dear, suppose we convert that program into a reality?"

"Jim, have you lost your senses?"

"No, I've just found them, dear. I've always loved you. Let us really go to San Francisco, dearest, and be happy the rest of our lives."

"How dare you insult me!" cried Lillian furiously. "And how dare you insult my husband? Oh, you traitor! I never dreamed you were so wicked. Leave me at once. Oh, John, John, why don't you come to me?"

She turned away from Jim, who hesitated, and then, with a hopeless expression on his face, went up to her.

"I'll go, then, Lily," he said. "But say you forgive me. It was your beauty fascinated me and threw me off my balance. Let me take you home."

"There's John!" cried Lillian aghast.

It was John, strolling amiably along the platform. He nodded nonchalantly to Jim, and raised his hat to his wife.

"Just in time, dear," he said. "What a joke to play on your poor old husband! I'm grateful to you, more grateful than I can tell, Jim, for finding her."

"It wasn't a joke!" cried Lily. "And Jim didn't find me. Jim was coming with me."

John smiled. "Well, he's coming back," he said. "Do you think you can make a nice Welsh rabbit for supper, Lily? Jim loves 'em—don't you, Jim?"

Lily, in despair, suffered her husband to take her by the arm, and soon the three were comfortably ensconced in a taxi. At the door, however, Jim turned away.

"I guess I won't come in tonight, old man," he said.

And, as John turned toward him: "I guess it'll be all right now, won't it?"

John gripped his hand. "You were a trump, Jim," he said. "I'll never forget it. The program worked?"

"Admirably."

Upstairs Lily began to cry her heart out. But John put his arm about her. "What is it, dear?" he asked.

"I don't know whether you knew it was just a pretense, or whether you didn't care," she sobbed.

John kissed her. "My dear, you don't think I'm a liar, do you?" he asked. "When I've stopped caring for you I'll tell you so. See?"

And Lillian did see, more clearly afterward when the truth leaked out. At first she was furious with Jim, and even now she is a little cold toward him. But as John sensibly says, "It doesn't do any harm to have one's wife cool to one's best friend. You never can tell how far a joke will go."

Bells' Summons More Than Call to Church

We hear them ringing so often, but do we think of them as more than a summons to church?

Our forefathers had many more uses for bells. In their superstitious way they believed that thunder and lightning could be driven from the parish by the ringing of the church bells.

The "Passing Bell" is still heard in some country parishes to bespeak the prayers of the faithful for some soul in extremis. The bell is rung or tolled nine strokes for a man, six strokes for a woman, and three strokes for a child. So do the villagers know for whom to pray.

It used to be quite usual in some parts of East Lancashire to ring the bells as noisily as possible after a funeral, the idea being that the loud noise would frighten away the evil spirits from the soul of the departed.

The "Dinner" or "Pudding Bell" is still rung in some country parishes. It is rung immediately the morning service is concluded, and the story goes that it is to let the people at home know that the good folks have finished their worship and are on their homeward way to "dinner" or "pudding."

Birds Change Mates

The idea that birds never get divorces but stick to their first loves throughout life received a rude jolt the other day when S. Prentiss Baldwin of Cleveland announced the results of a ten-year intensive study of bird habits.

Mr. Baldwin kept a day-by-day record of the lives of a number of household wrens that nested on his estate. These wrens, according to his report in Popular Science Monthly, usually raised two broods of young a year. But each year, between the broods, the parents usually changed mates. The mating lasted only while the young birds were helpless; then the parents felt free to make a new marital arrangement.

Salts Fine for Aching Kidneys

When Back Hurts Flush Your Kidneys as You Clean Your Bowels

Most folks forget that the kidneys, like the bowels, sometimes get sluggish and clogged and need a flushing occasionally, else we have backache and dull misery in the kidney region, severe headaches, rheumatic twinges, torpid liver, acid stomach, sleeplessness and all sorts of bladder disorders.

You simply must keep your kidneys active and clean and the moment you feel an ache or pain in the kidney region begin drinking lots of water. Also get about four ounces of Jad Salts from any good drug store here, take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys will then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and is intended to flush clogged kidneys and help stimulate them to activity. It also helps neutralize the acids in the urine so they no longer irritate, thus helping to relieve bladder disorders.

Jad Salts is inexpensive; makes a delightful effervescent lithia water drink which everybody should take now and then to help keep their kidneys clean.

A well-known local druggist says he sells lots of Jad Salts to folks who believe in trying to correct kidney trouble while it is only trouble.

Minneapolis Matron Feels Half Her Age

Mrs. Sarah Spencer, well-known in D. A. R., is hale and happy at 71. For two years her health was shattered. Now feels like 40 and credits Tanlac with rapid recovery

Mrs. Spencer is frankly outspoken about her experience. In her comfortable home at 2109 22nd Avenue, So., she made this statement:

"For two years I was in a rundown condition due to gas and acid stomach. Food lay like lead in the pit of my stomach and I often fasted a whole day rather than endure the agony that followed even the lightest meal. In addition to constipation and biliousness, my nerves were so unstrung that sleep was impossible. Many a night I've paced up and down my bedroom, tortured by knifelike stomach pains. Unable to do my housework or to go out like other folks, I grew tired of life and didn't care whether I lived or not.

"One day I read about a neighbor who overcame similar conditions with the aid of Tanlac so I went down and asked him about it. He stated emphatically that Tanlac had saved his life and urged me to try it. On the way home I bought three bottles and I want to say they put me on my feet. My appetite, digestion and sleep improved so that now I feel as well as I did at forty, and have gained 9 lbs. Tanlac will always have a warm place in my heart."

Tanlac is nature's own remedy, made from herbs, roots and barks. If your health is poor, try Tanlac today. Your druggist has it. Over 52,000,000 bottles sold.

"Ah, but, Madonna—" he began, his voice quavering, tears of intercession gathering in his eyes.

"No more, as you love me, Mario. Do my will. You cannot alter it."

And so Mario, heavy-hearted, went his ways to do as she commanded, whilst she followed soon thereafter to seek what sleep she could, and in that sleep the strength to perform the task that lay before her.

The morning found her pale but calm when she same to confront her bridegroom in the hall.

The lord of Pievano kept his chamber. Not all his stoicism was equal to the ordeal of sitting down to meat again with such a thing as Pantaleone, or witnessing the humiliation to which his daughter was to subject herself. However much he might esteem the end in view—since he was an Orsini before being a philosopher—he abhorred the means, and took the course of refusing them his countenance, and remaining passive. Yet—in justice to him be it said—of a certainty he would not have remained so had he known her full intent. A part of it only had she revealed to him.

Pantaleone was tortured between elation at the extraordinary good fortune that had so unexpectedly been flung into his lap and an irrepressible misgiving, an incredulity, a doubt as to its genuineness. Something of this was reflected in his glance as he came now into her presence. It had lost much of its habitual arrogant confidence; it seemed even a little strained.

They sat down to table to break their fast, with none to wait upon them but the silent, sphinx-like Mario. Even Raffaele was absent, and Pantaleone had missed the pert lad's ministrations on that morning of mornings.

He commented upon this, as much to ease the increasing strain of their silence as because he desired to know what had become of the page. Madonna excused the boy, saying that he was none so well and kept his bed. The truth was that he had but sought it a half-hour ago, upon his return from his ride to Castel della Pieve and the safe delivery of his letter.

They set out soon after, and took the road by the marsh toward Castel della Pieve. With them went Pantaleone's ten knaves, and Mario as Madonna's equerry by her insistence.

As they cantered briskly forward in the bright sunshine of that January morning, and the miles were flung behind them, Pantaleone's spirits rose, and conquered his last misgiving. Of treachery he had now no shadow of fear. Had she not delivered herself up to him? Were they not surrounded by men of his own? And must not the ducats and the rest follow as inevitably as the rising of tomorrow's sun? In this assurance he attempted to play the gallant, as befits a bridegroom; but he found her cold and haughty and reserved, and when he remonstrated, pointing out that she did not use him at all like one who was to be her husband by noontide, she retorted with a reminder that between them was naught but a bargain that had been struck.

This chilled him, and for a while he rode amain sulkily, with bent head and furrowed brows. But that soon passed. His abiding humor was too buoyant to suffer any permanent overclouding. Let her be as cold as ice at present. Anon he would know how to kindle her into living woman. He had so kindled a many in his day, and he was confident of his natural gifts in that direction. Not that it would greatly matter if she were to remain proof against his ardor. There were her ducats for ample consolation, and with her ducats he might procure elsewhere an abundance of the tenderness that she denied him.

Noon was striking from the Duomo as they rode under the deep archway of the Porta Pia and entered the town.

CHAPTER VII

The duke's army was encamped upon the eastern side of the city, so that Pantaleone had no inkling of his master's presence there until they had entered the main street and saw the abundant evidences of it in the soldiers that thronged everywhere chattering in all the dialects of Middle Italy. The part he had played at Pievano had so isolated Pantaleone from the outside world, that he had remained without precise knowledge of Cesare Borgia's whereabouts. His sudden realization that he had ridden almost into the very presence of the duke was as a shower of cold water upon his heated body. For you will understand that engaged as he was he had every reason to avoid the duke as he would avoid the devil.

He reined in sharply, and his eyes glared mistrustfully at Madonna, instinctively feeling that here was some trap into which like a fool he had been lured by this white-faced girl. It flashed across his mind that it had been his lifelong practice to mistrust lean women. Their very leanness was in his eyes an outward sign of their lack of femininity, and a woman that lacks femininity—as all the world knows—is as often as not a very devil.

"By your leave, Madonna," said he grimly, "we will seek a priest elsewhere."

"Why so?" she asked.

"Because it is my will," he snarled back.

She smiled a crooked little smile. She was calm and mistress of herself.

"It is early to impose your will upon me, and if you are over-insistent now, perhaps you never shall—for I marry you at Castel della Pieve or I do not marry you at all."

He looked at her, blenching with anger. "God's Blood!" he swore, and gave tongue to that thought of his. "I never yet knew a lean woman that was not sly and a very bag of devil's tricks. What is in that mind of yours?"

And then suddenly a hoarse voice hailed him, and from among the passers-by there rolled forward a grizzled veteran upon sturdy bowed legs, a swarthy, one-eyed fellow, who creaked and clanked as he walked, being all mail and leather. It was Valentinois' captain, Taddeo della Volpe.

"Well returned, my Pantaleone!" he cried. "The duke named you but yesterday, wondering how you fared."

"Did he so?" said Pantaleone, since he must say something, raging inwardly to find his retreat cut off by this most inopportune encounter.

The veteran rolled his single eye in the direction of Madonna Fulvia. "Is this the prisoner you were sent to capture?" quoth he, and Pantaleone could not be sure that he was not being mocked. "But I delay you. You'll be for the duke. I'll go with you."

Now here was Pantaleone in desperate straits. Mechanically he moved forward with Taddeo, since to obey his very natural impulse and turn about to retreat by the way he had come was now utterly impossible. Nor could be question Madonna as he desired to do whilst Della Volpe stalked there beside him.

A dozen paces brought them to the open space before the Duomo, and there Pantaleone grew cold with fear to find himself almost face to face with Cesare Borgia himself.

As he checked his horse, mechanically in his dismay, Madonna Fulvia dealt her own a cut across the hams that launched it forward as from a catapult.

"Justice!" she cried, brandishing above her head what looked like a short truncheon. "Lord duke of Valentinois, justice!"

There was a commotion in the magnificent group about his highness. The wild bound of her horse had brought her almost into the midst of it.

The duke raised his hand, and the cavalcade came to a sudden halt. His splendid eyes swept over her, and there was something in his glance that seemed to scorch her.

She beheld for the first time this man, the enemy of her house, one whom she had come to consider a very monster. He was dressed in black, in the Spanish fashion, his doublet scrolled with golden arabesques, his velvet cap laced with a string of smoldering rubies large as sparrows' eggs. From under this the wave of his bronze-colored hair fell to his shoulders. The delicate yet essentially male beauty of his young face was such that for a moment it checked her cruel purpose.

A smile, gentle, almost wistful, broke upon that noble countenance, and he spoke in a voice that was soft and full of melody.

"What justice do you seek," Madonna?"

To combat the sweet seduction of his face and voice she had need in that hour to bethink her of her cousins strangled at Assisi, of those other kinsmen jailed in Rome and like to die, and of her own lover, Matteo, in peril of capture and death. What, then, if this man were a very miracle of male beauty? Was he not the enemy of her race? Did he not seek Matteo's life? Had he not set that foul hound of his to track Matteo down?

"Just Take a Look"

The woman was accustomed to a well-organized bookstore, with books carefully arranged according to classifications. She went into a store downtown and inquired of a book clerk, "Where do you keep your devotionals?"

"Ma'am?" said the clerk.

"Where do you keep your devotionals?" again asked the woman.

"Huh—I mean, what?" said the clerk.

"Aren't your books classified? Where are your devotionals?" persisted the woman.

"Oh, yes, ah—yes, all our books are on these tables," stammered the clerk. "Yes, ma'am, you'll find all the books on these tables. You just take a look, will you, and maybe you'll find the book you're looking for?"

The woman did not "take a look," but walked out in much disgust.—Springfield Union.

In Later Years of Life

Good Elimination is More Than Ever Important.

AS we grow older, there is apt to be a gradual slowing up of bodily functions. The kidneys are the blood filters. Proper function cleanses the blood stream thoroughly. Sluggish function is apt to permit some retention of uric acid and other poisons. This tends to make one tired, listless and achy—to have drowsy headaches and dizziness and perhaps a toxic backache. That the kidneys are not functioning properly is often shown by scanty or burning passages. Elderly people recommend Doan's Pills in this condition. This tested diuretic is endorsed the country over. Ask your neighbor!

Partiality

Ex-Mayor Hylan said of a notorious miscarriage of justice:

"A woman claimed that she treated her daughter and her stepdaughter exactly alike.

"'I love them both,' she said to a visitor one day, 'and I treat them both alike. No favoritism.'

"Just then the front door opened and the woman called sweetly:

"'Is that you, darling?'

"'No, ma'am,' answered the tired voice of the stepdaughter, 'it's only me.'"

Thin Cream

Thin cream causes an unnecessary loss of skim-milk. It has a poor keeping quality. It costs the creamery more to handle and churn thin cream than it does richer cream.

Cream testing from 35 per cent to 40 per cent in the summer time and 30 per cent to 35 per cent in the winter is best for both producer and creamery. A Land O' Lakes cream should test at least 25 per cent. This is the official standard, and it is our wish that our patrons check up on their test and see if their test complies with the rules.

Holt Made Great Christmas Seal Sale Increase

Holt is included on the list of Minnesota towns making the greatest increase over 1925 in the Christmas Seal Sale conducted in December, according to the announcement of the Minnesota Public Health Association. The recent sale raised a total of $24.60 as compared with 13.70 in 1925, the report shows.

Mr. R. J. Vieths, Superintendent of the Holt school, who managed the local campaign, has received a letter congratulating him on this splendid increase, highly praising all local volunteer workers who helped make the sale a success, and expressing appreciation for the generous manner in which local citizens reponded to the appeal.

Plans for county and the state-wide anti-tuberculosis program for 1927 have been outlined and will be definitely decided on as soon as the final reports of the seal sale receipts are received, and the amount of money available for the work is definitely known.

As the southbound mail now goes half hour earlier, all letters and parcels must be mailed by two o'clock.

From now on it will be impossible to wait on both village and country people between trains, therefore those in and near town should mail their letters and parcels and get their money orders in the forenoon.

A little cooperation on the part of the public will greatly help us at this time of the year.

SCHOOL NOTES

The Seventh Grade History Class is studying the American Revolution. A chart has been started illustrating the growth of discontent in America and the causes of the Revolution.

New Hygiene and Sanitation books have been received for both seventh and eighth grades. This book is entitled "Health and Good Citizenship". The pupils are working on a health chart illustrating the different health rules.

The eighth grade Arithmetic class are beginning to worry about a new topic: the study of cubic volume. Pupils make up their own problems dealing with the volume of coal bins, boxes, rooms, and other rectangular objects.

The sixth grade geography class has been studying the Balkan countries, and has had some very interesting discussions on Bulgaria and Jugo-Slavia.

The English I class has started to study "The Merchant of Venice" by Shakespeare. They have just finished reading "Old Testament Stories."

The English IV class is now studying Carlyle's "Essay on Burns."

The American History students are studying the Civil War which is about the most important period in American History.

As February 14 was St. Valentine's Day, there was quite a stir in the School Building, especially between eight and eleven o'clock p. m., when the seventh and eighth graders entertained the high schoolers at a party given in the auditorium. There were games and also music. At 10:30 a lunch was served after which Valentines were distributed, and a and a short speech was given by Mr. Vieths.

Another shipment of library books has just been received. They number 73, and will be classified at once, placed on the shelves and then we can boast of about 570 volumes in the library. For an accredited high school, the required number of volumes in the library is 550.

—14—

Upon the muttered answer to those unuttered questions she braced herself, steeled her resolve and held out the tube she carried.

"It is all set down here, magnificent, in this petition."

He moved his horse forward some paces from amid his attendant courtiers, and without haste put forth his gauntleted hand to receive the thing she proffered. He balanced it in his palm a moment, as if weighing it, considering it. It was a hollow cane, sealed at both ends. A faint smile moved his lips under cover of his auburn beard.

"Here are great precautions," was his gentle comment, and his eyes stabbed her with questions.

"I would not have it polluted on its way to your august hands," she explained.

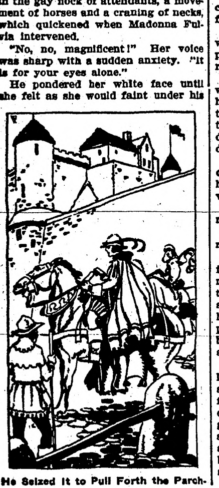
His smile broadened. He inclined his head as if to acknowledge the courtliness of her speech. Then his glance went beyond her and rested on the scared and savage Pantaleone.

Cesare's brows were faintly raised. "Why, Messer Pantaleone!" he cried. "You are well returned, and most opportunely. Here, break me these seals and read me the parchment this tube contains."

There was a sudden stir of interest in the gay flock of attendants, a movement of horses and a craning of necks, which quickened when Madonna Fulvia intervened.

"No, no, magnificent!" Her voice was sharp with a sudden anxiety. "It is for your eyes alone."

He pondered her white face until she felt as she would faint under his regard, such was the terror with which it was beginning to inspire her. He smiled with a sweetness as ineffable as it was terrible and he addressed her in his silkiest accents.



He Seized It to Pull Forth the Parchment.

"Since beholding you, Madonna, my eyes are something dazzled. I must borrow Ser Pantaleone's, there, and be content to employ my ears." Then to Pantaleone on a sudden note of sharp command: "Come, sir," he said, "we wait."

Pantaleone, a little dazed by his terror, took the thing in his shaking hands, and not daring to demur or show hesitation, broke one of the seals with clumsy, fumbling fingers. A silken cord protruded from the tube. He seized it to pull forth the parchment, then with a sharp exclamation he drew back his hand as if he had been stung—as indeed he had been. There was a speck of blood on his thumb and another on his forefinger.

Madonna Fulvia shot a fearful glance at Valentinois. She saw here the miscarriage of her crafty plan, through the one factor which she had left out of consideration—the circumstance that Cesare Borgia, living and moving in an environment of treachery, amid foes both secret and avowed, took no chances of falling a victim either to their force or their guile. She had not reckoned that he would appoint Pantaleone in this matter to an office akin to that filled at his table by the venom-taster.

"Come, come," the duke was admonishing the hesitating Pantaleone, more sharply now. "Are we to wait here in the cold all day? The petition, man!"

Desperately Pantaleone now grasped the cord, taking care this time to avoid the thorn that accident or design—and he did not greatly care which, since he counted himself lost in any case—had lodged in the strands of the silk. He drew forth a cylinder of parchment, let fall the cane that had contained it, unrolled the petition with shaking hands, and studied it awhile, his brow wrinkled by the effort, for he was an indifferent scholar.

"Well, sir? Will you read?"

Precipitately he responded to that command, and fell to reading aloud, his voice hoarse:

"Magnificent—By these presents I make appeal to you for justice against one who has proved as treacherous to you in the performance of the task to which you set him as was treacherous that task itself—"

He broke off, looking up with the wild eyes of a hunted thing.

"It—it is not true!" he protested, faltering. "I—"

"Who bade you judge?" Cesare asked. "I bade you read; no more. Read on, then. Should it prove to concern you your answer to it can follow."

Under the suasion of that imperious will, Pantaleone bent his eyes to the parchment again, and pursued his reading.

"—Believing that Matteo Orsini, whom he was bidden to arrest, is in hiding at Pievano, he has consented to connive at his escape and thus betray your trust in him upon the condition that I become his wife and my dowry his possession."

Again he broke off. "By the Eyes of God, it is false! As false as hell!" he cried, a sob of agony breaking his voice.

"Read on!" The duke's voice and mien were alike terrible.

Dominated once more, Pantaleone returned yet again to the parchment.

". . . Escape may or may not be for Matteo, but at least there can be no escape for you who read, by the time you have read thus far. We have another guest at Pievano in our lazar-house there—the smallpox. And these presents have lain an hour upon the breast of one who is dying of it, and . . ."

On a sudden outcry of terror Pantaleone brought his reading abruptly to an end. The plague-laden parchment floated from his hands that were suddenly turned limp. It reached the ground, and there was a sudden alarmed movement on all sides to back away beyond the radius of its venom, beyond the danger of the dread scourge that it exuded.

Dully through Pantaleone's benumbed wits the realization thrust itself that the thorn in the silk had been no accident. It had been set there of intent, so that it might open a way by which the terrible infection should travel the more swiftly and surely into the reader's veins. He knew himself for a doomed man, one who might count himself under sentence of death, since the chances of winning alive through an attack of that pestilence were so slight as to be almost negligible. Ashen-faced he stared straight before him, what time indignation and horror found voice on every side, and continued clamant until the duke raised an imperious hand to demand silence.

He alone remained unmoved, or at least showed no outward sign of such anger as he may have felt. When next he addressed the white-faced lady, who had made this desperate attempt upon his life, his voice was as smooth and silken as it had been before, his returning smile as sweet. And perhaps because of that the doom he pronounced was the more awful.

"Of course," he said, "since Ser Pantaleone has fulfilled his part of the bargain, you, Madonna, will now fulfill yours. You will wed him as you undertook."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

It is impossible to drown sorrow; it has been in the swim too long.

Famous Chairs

One of the most beautiful chairs in the world is the chair of Dagobert, king of the Franks, who died in the year 638. It is made of cast and chiseled bronze of very fine workmanship. But St. Peter's chair at Rome is said to be the most ancient and interesting piece of furniture in existence.

Riches Mock Woman; Lonely, Kills Self

Waterbury, Conn.—Lulu Morden, who came East alone ten years ago with a determination to succeed in the business world, and who accomplished her desire to the extent of some half-million dollars, is dead by her own hand because in her eagerness for financial independence she neglected to make any friends.

Loneliness developed into despair, and so the president and treasurer of the Morden Manufacturing company, doing a business of $150,000 a year, turned on the gas in one of the 16 rooms of her large home here.

Miss Morden started her business of making loose-leaf books and stationery appliances with almost nothing, and when she died the business was employing 300 men, and she had accumulated a fortune of about $500,000.

"DEVIL" LETTERS TRACED BY LAW

Defective Letter in Machine Reveals Writer.

Danville, Va.—A local committee of investigation has established the authorship of nine anonymous letters signed "The Devil," which were sent through the mails to the nine Danville ministers who recently voted against extending an invitation to Evangelist M. F. Ham to come to Danville.

The development is likely to add to discontent between laymen and the organized ministry in Danville and is upsetting the movement started by older churchmen who are trying to relegate to the background an issue in which they see danger to the church generally.

The anonymous letters, typewritten, express to the ministers the keen appreciation of "his saturine majesty for promoting his kingdom on earth," and contain unflattering references to the ministers' character and religion.

A professional man who was suspected denied that he wrote the letters, but one of the investigators secured entry to his office, took a specimen of work from his typewriter, and found that one of the letters had the same flaw as that appearing in all of the anonymous letters.

The professional man was shown "the proof." He excused himself by saying that he had not "written" the letters but had dictated them. He said that he was laboring under high religious strain at the time. His name has not been made public.

Picks Bear's Hollow Log for a Sleeping Place

Holland, Mich.—Dr. Willis Geerlings tried to spend a night in a bear's home when lost in the northern woods. One experience is sufficient, Doctor Geerlings said, after an argument with a 220-pound bear. On a deer hunting trip in the upper peninsula the physician became lost in a swamp with darkness coming on. He picked out a hollow log and decided to enlarge the opening and spend the night.

Suddenly hearing a noise, he turned and saw a black bear approaching. The doctor realized then that he was disturbing the home of the bear. The hunter fired and toppled the bear, which jumped and ran. Meantime, Doctor Geerling's brother, who was searching for him, arrived. By the light of a lantern the two tracked the bear.

They came on the wounded bear, which showed fight but was killed by a second shot. The doctor brought his bear home with him along with a deer.

Dove Found in Ice Cake Recovers When Thawed

Platteville, Wis.—A dove found frozen in a cake of ice has been sufficiently revived to again forage for itself, according to Ben Davis, who found the bird in its peculiar trap. Davis, employed as guard at the ruins of the $150,000 city hall here, heard a fluttering in a cake of ice formed by water which had been poured on the building when fire broke out in sub-zero weather. He broke the ice cake with an axe and took the dove uninjured, but weak, to his home.

Nitro-Glycerin Filled Dog Falls and Explodes

Irvine, Ky.—With an explosion of nitroglycerin within the body of a dog a short season of fright in a section of Lee county oil fields near here came to an end. The dog drank about a pint of the explosive and oil men tried to capture it, but the dog ran away.

The workers cleared out and the owner of the dog moved his wife and ten children from their home.

Later the dog chased a rabbit over a 50-foot precipice, fell, and exploded.

Dogs Slaughtered

Paris, France.—Ten thousand dogs were turned into the city pound last year and all were killed except 184 which were sold.

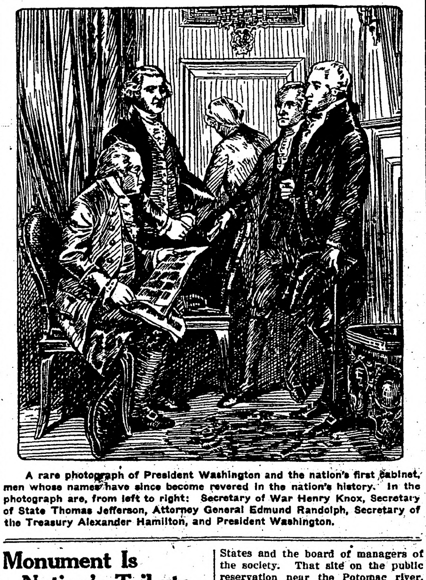
WASHINGTON AND FIRST CABINET

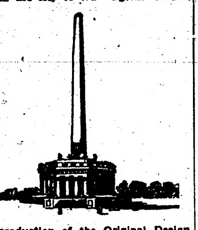


A rare photograph of President Washington and the nation's first cabinet, men whose names have since become revered in the nation's history. In the photograph are, from left to right: Secretary of War Henry Knox, Secretary of State Thomas Jefferson, Attorney General Edmund Randolph, Secretary of the Treasury Alexander Hamilton, and President Washington.

Monument Is Nation's Tribute to Greatest Son

The idea of a monument to the memory of George Washington originated in the house of representatives. It was the ultimate outcome of a resolution introduced by John Marshall in 1799 "that a marble monument be erected by the United States in the capital, at the city of Washington, and that the family of General Washington be requested to permit his body to be deposited under it; and that the monument be so designed as to commemorate the great events of his military and political life." Before this, however, the Continental congress, in 1783, had adopted the resolution "that an equestrian statue of General Washington be erected at the place where the residence of congress shall be established."

In considering these two resolutions congress amended the former so as to provide that a "mausoleum of American granite and marble, in pyramidal form, 100 feet at the base and of proportionate height shall be erected in the city of Washington." Meanwhile, the equestrian statue mentioned in the resolution of the Continental congress culminated in the statue by Greenough, which was placed in the rotunda of the Capitol in 1841. But it was later moved to the east front of the Capitol; and more recently to the Smithsonian museum.



Reproduction of the Original Design of the Washington Monument.

No definite steps were taken toward the erection of the monument until 1833. During that year the Washington National Monument society was organized, with the idea of erecting a monument by popular subscription. In 1836 the society invited American artists to submit designs for a monument. The only requirement was that any plans submitted should "harmoniously blend durability, simplicity and grandeur." The cost of the proposed structure was to be not less than $1,000,000.

Proposed Memorial.

Many designs were submitted. The one selected was that submitted by Robert Mills, a prominent architect of his time. This design, known as the original design of the Washington National monument, is reproduced in the accompanying illustration. The plan, as shown, was a circular colonnaded building, 250 feet in diameter and 100 feet high, from which was to spring an obelisk shaft 70 feet square at the base and 500 feet high.

But funds for the monument accumulated slowly because contributions had been limited to one dollar a person. Thus, it was 1847 before enough money to justify beginning the building of the monument was accumulated.

In 1848 congress adopted another resolution authorizing the society to erect a monument upon a site to be selected by the President of the United States and the board of managers of the society. That site on the public reservation near the Potomac river, where the monument now stands, was selected. The corner stone of the monument was laid on July 4, of that year. This stone was a block of marble weighing 24,500 pounds, and was quarried and presented to the society by Thomas Symington of Baltimore. The stone selected for the foundation was the blue rock of the Potomac valley, in blocks weighing from six to eight tons.

Design Changed.

When the actual work was begun Mills' plan of a circular colonnaded building at the base was abandoned and only the obelisk shaft, which was changed as to proportions, was retained. On this plan the monument was finally erected to a height of 150 feet, by 1860. Then the Civil war halted work on it. But at the end of the war further appeals were made to the public for contributions, and to congress for co-operation. It was in 1876 that the resolution was offered to that body for the completion of the monument. This act, as passed, carried with it an appropriation of $200,000. It provided for the transfer to the government of all property of the Washington National Monument society, and that the construction of the monument be placed under the joint supervision of the President of the United States, the supervising architect of the Treasury department, the architect of the Capitol, the chief engineers of the army and the first vice president of the society.

The first work on the resumption of the construction of the monument was the strengthening and enlarging of its foundation. This was because the original foundation was found to be inadequate to bear the proposed shaft.

Stands on Original Site.

The completed monument, which stands 555 feet high, was dedicated in February, 1885. The total cost was nearly $1,200,000. Thousands of pilgrims visit it every year, many of them traveling to its summit to view the marvelous panorama of their national capital.

Contrary to a rumor at one time, the Washington monument has never been moved. From the very beginnings of its construction it has remained on the present site. However, in one sense, the monument moves daily with the sun, turning upon an arc under the influence of the rays of heat. Likewise it moves under pressure of the wind. But despite these daily and occasional movements there never has been the slightest disturbance of poise.—Pathfinder Magazine.

Everything I ate, no matter how light or how little, brought on those gas and heartburn pains. My stomach was certainly in a bad way, and I grew weaker every day, it seemed. Finally I was worn down to 102 lbs., and so weak I could hardly stand up. Nothing I tried gave me any real help.

"At last I tried Tanlac, and used three bottles in all. Results speak for themselves: I'm strong and robust now, weigh 135 lbs. and never felt better. Magnolia Gardens

ON THE little Ashley river near quaint old Charleston, S. C., there is a twenty-four acres Magnolia garden that is said to be the most beautiful in this world. An enraptured visitor long age declared it to be "A garden spot so lovely it seems to have been dropped from a fairy tale."

The magnificence and the enchantment of this fairy-like place grow with passing years. Each March and April it unfolds a riotous glory of azalea, japonica and wisteria blossoms, which run the gamut of color from the most delicate shades of heliotrope and pink to the deepest shades of purple—perfuming the country roundabout.

These gardens are almost a century old. Part of a large and worthy estate known as Magnolia-on-the-Ashley, they were so named because a Reverend Drayton who planned them brought to them from far-off places a famous azalea and other rare plants.

The flower beds are laid out with backgrounds of vines and shrubs, set down amid ancient and ponderous trees. The picture so stirred Owen Wister, the author, that he wrote: "I have seen gardens, many gardens, in England, in France, in Italy; I have seen what can be done in great hothouses, and on great terraces; what can be done under a roof, and what can be done in the open air with the aid of architecture and sculpture, and ornamented land and water, but no horticulture that I have seen devised by mortal man approaches the earthly enchantment of these azaleas."

Reelfoot Lake

REELFOOT lake, in the extreme northwestern corner of Tennessee—the only large lake in that state—has the distinction of having come into existence overnight by reason of an earthquake.

Reelfoot was the name of an Indian who, tradition relates, was born with a deformed foot which caused him to reel as he ambled along and who lived in that vicinity.

History tells us that during the night of December 16, 1811, a violent trembling of the earth took place in this locality. This was followed by a rumbling noise like distant thunder. Then the air became charged with a sulphurous vapor. Man and beast alike became frightened. Trees fell. The mighty Mississippi rolled and roared. A terrific eruption occurred. Earth rockings continued at too-frequent-to-be-comfortable intervals for several weeks.

The river broke over its banks, carrying everything before it. The town of New Madrid, Mo., sank about fifteen feet. Ponds and lakes dried up.

Investigation showed that a lake some eighteen miles long and three miles wide had formed on the Tennesee side of the river.

A desolate region of waste and ruin then, nature has since bestowed a strange beauty upon it. The waters are inhabited with fish, lily pads float upon the surface, varicolored wild flowers and grasses line its banks, cypress trees grow in it, wild fowl use it as a refuge and opossum, muskrat, beaver and milk find homes there in season.

The St. Lawrence River

THE St. Lawrence—the greatest river in all Canada, is also one of the greatest in the world. It drains an area in excess of 500,000 square miles, including the largest body of fresh water in the world. The estimated volume of its flow at its mouth is said to be exceded only by that of the Amazon in South America.

The St. Lawrence is a river unusual. Instead of starting as a streamlet, gathering water from tributaries as it rolls along, its water is collected and stored for it. The water settles in storage, hence is clear and pure and as the level of the settling basin changes very little, this river is not subject to floods.

At the outlet of Lake Ontario it takes up the job of carrying the overflow of the five great lakes to the sea. Starting off in a northeastwardly direction, it accommodatingly acts as dividing line between Canada and the United States for some eighty odd miles.

Serenely and peacefully it flows through a wilderness of beautifully-wooded isles known as the Thousand Islands, then gallops along through a series of rapids to Montreal. As far as Quebec it flows mainly through low lands and past a cultivated area of rare neatness. East of Quebec the north bank is lined with bold and rugged forest-clad cliffs, the river gradually broadens and deepens to its gulf, where its width approaches ninety miles and its depth is estimated to be about 1,200 feet.

Ocean-going vessels ascend this majestic stream as far as Montreal—600 miles from the Atlantic.

THE MOVING SPIRIT

By GEORGE E. COBB

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman.)

"NEW neighbors, Ezra," announced Mrs. Perkins.

"That so? Hope we don't lose them as quick as we did the last ones."

"Maybe that was our own fault," submitted his wife. "They sort of perked up with their stiff city ways and it nettled me. You was down with that spell of rheumatism most of the time and Walden was away at school. It's lonesome and dismal to see the place next door vacant all the while. Besides, every new family we win to stay helps the town. Let us try and make this new family stay."

"Who are they?" inquired Mr. Perkins.

"Their names is Purtelle—father, mother, young lady.

"Just match us, don't they?" suggested Mr. Perkins. "Well, you're the moving spirit, Janet, and me and the boy will follow the leader."

Ned Perkins and his father humbly took heed to quite a lecture that evening. Mrs. Perkins showed that she not only had studied out a plan as to the treatment of their prospective neighbors, but had pursued certain inquiries that had resulted in the gleaning of a good deal of information regarding them.

They never lived in a country town before, I understand," said Mrs. Perkins. "Mr. Purtelle has just retired from business and his wife has worn herself out with her social dities, fussing for company, I suppose that means. The girl is just out of school. She is in love with flowers, chickens, everything that grows and runs. They are real nice people."

"I don't doubt it, if you say so, Janet," observed her husband. "And they will be good neighbors."

"You said a young lady in the family, eh?" remarked Ned thoughtfully.

"Yes, and you be good to her—them, Ned," warned his mother.

"I will to her—them," pledged Ned, with a broad smile.

"Now the city people are slow to get acquainted with," went on Mrs. Perkins. "Don't intrude yourself. Be pleasant, but dignified. Show them all the kindness you can. Above all, do everything in your power to set them in love with the country life. Now, Ned, do spare enough time from your athletics and fishing to pay some attention to these good people."

"Mother mine," responded Ned with sunshiny alacrity, "I'll do just that thing, and as to the fishing—why, I'll have this Miss—Miss—"

"Miss Edna Purtelle."

"Yes, Edna a member of the Anglers' club inside of a week!"

"Don't be too forward, Ned," warned his mother.

That evening two big vans loaded with furniture arrived, and nearly all night long their drivers were putting up shades, laying down rugs and getting the house generally in order.

It was not until after dusk the next evening that two members of the Purtelle family, mother and daughter, arrived. Ned was away fishing at the time, but his mother informed him of the circumstances upon his return.

"The father must be detained in town on business," surmised Mr. Perkins, "for he did not come with them."

Ned was up bright and early. He paced around the garden, and then hearing a swish beyond the fence, man high, that separated the two residences, moved toward it. As he tiptoed to look over, an eager, curious faced girl likewise tiptoed, with tiny feet resting on the inside stringer. She lifted to him a rosebud vision of beauty.

"You was peeping, I was peeping—oh dear!" exclaimed the little maiden breathlessly, jumping down in confusion.

"Then we must be interested in one another," suggested Ned.

"Oh, I know," fluttered Edna, "they told me a boy lived next door.

"Boy!" began Ned resentfully, and then audaciously: "I am the boy next door, little girl."

Edna pouted charmingly. She was plucking at a rambler rose vine that covered the fence, reaching over it and dropped in great fragrant clusters over into the next yard.

"Oh, dear," she gasped. "I mustn't do that!"

"Why not?" he inquired.

"They're your roses."

"Not at all," declared Ned unblushingly. "The law on partition fences out here in the country is that half of it belongs to each adjoining tenant and all that hangs over it."

"Then I can pick all the roses I want?"

"Why, certainly, and come over and get as many more from our side."

"Oh, I couldn't do that without asking mother," demurred Edna, and ran into the house.

Ned was charmed. More than that, he was smitten. He managed to be at his post in the garden immediately after breakfast. He observed Edna looking wistfully towards the cherry trees at the back of the Perkins house.

"I never saw cherries grow before," she said wistfully.

"Why don't you get a basket and pick some?" he insinuated, "in your own orchard?"

"Our orchard?"

"Why yes. That strip back of you is free to you. Lot law out in the country, you know?"

Edna regarded him keenly and suspiciously, but his face was an innocent blank. The audacious fellow did not explain to Edna that it was a continuation of the Perkins lot that went around the new neighbor's domain.

She went wild with delight as he got a stepladder, held the basket and let her pick the ripe, bursting globes in "her orchard." In fact, up till nearly noon they were together and Ned forgot all about his fishing.

Later that day a coop of chickens arrived. Edna called over the fence to know if Ned couldn't come over and get the new arrivals into the chicken house. This led to an introduction to Mrs. Purtelle, who showed herself well pleased with the young man.

"And when will there be some eggs? When do the chickens lay most?" fluttered Edna.

"Why—well, night times mostly," reported Ned unflinchingly.

"Then there will be some fresh eggs for breakfast in the morning!" cried Edna delightedly.

There was, notwithstanding that Ned had discovered that the imported brood consisted mostly of roosters. In the morning with a scream of wild joy Edna discovered nearly two dozen eggs, surreptitiously placed in the nests before daylight by the obliging Ned.

Again a day of rare companionship, Cupid forging the chains closer and closer as the sunny hours went by. Then Edna was full of the theme of the little chicks. A "setting" was duly provided for by Ned.

"And when will the litle darlings be ripe?" inquired the eager novice in rural ways.

"Well," responded Ned slowly with cold devoted serenity, "with warm weather, by morning."

"Oh, I shall be awake at daylight!" declared the excited enthusiast.

"So will I!" voted Ned, and he was. At the weird hour of midnight he had substituted a new brood of their own for the setting.

Mr. Purtelle arrived at the end of the week. He stared hard at Edna, as she introduced Ned, as if he were some old-time chum. Then there was a closer acquaintance of the members of the family all around. One day the truant pair came home consciously flustered.

"I asked her and I love her," Ned told Mr. Purtelle promptly.

"Humph!" growled Mr. Purtelle, good naturedly enough," and what about the false pretenses of cherries, eggs and the like?"

"Oh, that shows his kind disposition, papa!" chirped Edna. "I saw through the humbug of his 'lot law' and twelve-hour chickens all the time, but he was so obliging—so anxious to please me, that I led him on because—why, because," acknowledged the blushing maid, "I—I loved him."

Remains of Synagogue in Ruins of Capernaum

Conspicuous among the ruins of Capernaum of the present day standing at the water's edge, are sculptured blocks of white limestone in sharp contrast with the surrounding fragments of black basalt. Partly buried by the debris of ages, disfigured further by the incessant thefts of people seeking limestone for their kilns, the large white edifice greatly attracted the attention of the members of the Palestine exploration fund survey some half century or more ago.

Careful investigation and much difficult work at length revealed the ground plan of a Jewish synagogue, like nine others disinterred in the Holy land, rectangular, longest north and south, and divided into five aisles by four rows of pillars, three entrances being at the south end, a large central one with smaller ones on either side. Over the lintels above the doors there is always cut into the stone some characteristic Jewish emblem, a seven-branched candelstick, a Paschal lamb, vine leaves with grapes, etc.

Some of the larger blocks, including beautiful capitals of the overturned pillars remain intact. Captain (afterward Colonel) Wilson of the Palestine fund survey one day overturned a large cut stone and found sculptured into its face a representation of the pot of manna ordered by God to be placed in the ark of the covenant.

There would appear to be no reasonable doubt but that it was the lintel over the door of the synagogue the kindly centurion built for the people of Capernaum, now a mass of ruins. Probably it was to that very carving Jesus pointed while preaching in that same building saying: "I am that bread of life. Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness and are dead." (John 6.)

New Silk Process

The Department of Commerce has received a report from Berlin stating that a German inventor has perfected a process by which the chitin or bony structure of lobster and crab shells can be converted into artificial silk. According to the inventor himself, chitin can be brought into a solution and passed through a filter press and then drawn into artificial silk threads which have a much greater tensile strength than cellulose silk.

Boy Scouts Increase

In the United States as well as in England, the boy scout movement is growing to enormous proportions. At this time there are about 800,000 registered boy scouts in good standing in the United States. The movement not only interests the boys themselves, but it has been the means of interesting many parents and other adults in scout activities.

Clean Kidneys By Drinking Lots of Water

Take Salts to Flush Kidneys if Bladder Bothers or Back Hurts

Eating too much rich food may produce kidney trouble in some form, says a well-known authority, because the acids created excite the kidneys. Then they become overworked, get sluggish, clog up and cause all sorts of distress, particularly backache and misery in the kidney region, rheumatic twinges, severe headaches, acid stomach, constipation, torpid liver, sleeplessness, bladder and urinary irritation.

The moment your back hurts or kidneys aren't acting right, or if bladder bothers you, begin drinking lots of good water and also get about four ounces of Jad Salts from any good pharmacy; take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to flush clogged kidneys and stimulate them to activity; also to neutralize the acids in the system so that they no longer irritate, thus often relieving bladder disorders.

Jad Salts can not injure anyone; makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink which millions of men and women take now and then to help keep the kidneys and urinary organs clean, thus often avoiding serious kidney disorders.

SCHOOL NOTES

The first and second graders visited the office Tuesday morning to see the broadcasting station, Mr. Vieths explained how to broadcast and asked each child to say "Hello." He has also invited the children to broadcast Friday afternoon from 3 to 4 o'clock. We hope many of the parents will be listening in.

The first and second graders have George Washington's home, Mount Vernon, on their sand-table. Numerous ladies and gentlemen are seen on the terrace. Back of the house there are several negro boys jigging, while the mothers and boys are watching.

The third and fourth graders had a short program on Tuesday afternoon, George Washington's birthday. Short stories about Washington, which the children had written, and several poems were read.

During the past week the fifth and sixth graders have been busy writing stories of Lincoln and Washington. These have been put into patriotic booklets on the covers of which are silhouettes of both men.

The fifth and sixth graders received some letters from the sixth graders in Lowry, Minnesota. They will answer them some time this week.

The fifth and sixth grade room has been neater looking since they have decided to have someone each week to look after the desks and to the general neatness of the room.

The seventh grade is studying "The Courtship of Miles Standish" by Longfellow. This type of metrical tale is an excellent story with which to catch the interest of the children and can be read without much explanation.

The eighth grade Civics class is beginning the study of the Constitution of the United States. Every pupil in the class has a chance to report on an article of interest dealing with the Constitution.

The seventh grade is studying the American Revolution. Each day events are placed on a chart representing the causes, battles, and results, of the Revolution. This chart consists of a tree, which represents the Revolution, and branches, which aid in the development of the Revolution.

"'Certainly, use anything you want to,' said the ignorant, but kindly employer, 'and if we haven't enough in stock I'll send out and buy you some.'"—Los Angeles Times.

ONE can't feel well when there is a retention of poisonous waste in the blood. This is called a toxic condition, and is apt to make one tired, dull and languid. Carlsbad Cavern

CARLSBAD CAVERN in the Guadalupe mountains in northeastern New Mexico, although known locally for a long time, was not explored at length until quite recently. Its startling magnitude was a genuine surprise.

Descending some two hundred feet from the crest of a hill, one gazes upon a new world, the enormity of which staggers the imagination. Apparently, he has stepped off into what might have been some giant's playground—everything having been conceived on such a large scale.

Stretching away for practically a mile, like a broad avenue, are great walls ranging from 100 to 1,000 feet apart, smooth here and rough yonder, worn so doubtless by the coursing of water ages ago. There rises a great stalagmite formation with fluted sides, like a curved column for a king's mansion. Yonder is a stone formation resembling a waterfall. Then, there is a straight-sided pit some 150 feet deep; great chambers of unbelievable size—some perhaps 500 feet wide, their high ceilings hung with stalactites ranging in size from a few inches to the full height of the room; massive blocks of limestone one hundred or more feet across and other surprising specimens of subterranean architecture.

No one knows how deep or how large this titanic cavern is. Students of caves think that it may exceed all other American caves, both in size and beauty of decoration and that some of its grotesque embellishments, which exist in total darkness, may be 100,000 years old.

Sakakawea

WHEN Thomas Jefferson was President of these United States he commissioned Captains Meriwether Lewis and William Clark to explore and trace the Missouri river to its source, cross the mountains and follow the waterways to the Pacific coast, or as the Indians expressed it, "To make a trail from the Far East to the shore of the Everywhere Salt Water."

They reached the Indian settlement at Mandan, N. D., in safety. Here they met an Indian squaw named Sakakawea—meaning Bird Woman, who came from a country much farther west, and as a consequence knew something about this hitherto-untraveled-by-the-white-man country, who volunteered to accompany them as guide and interpreter.

Accordingly, they traveled on and on and on. Finally, they reached a valley inhabited by Indians. At a council between the explorers and the Indians Sakakawea recognized the chief as being her brother. He confided to her that they intended killing the white men to obtain their food, guns and black sand (gunpowder). By convincing him that such action would be a grave mistake, she made it possible for Lewis and Clark to carry out the President's instructions and make the trail which extended the boundary line of our country from the Mississippi to the Pacific.

To commemorate so unusual a heroic and daring an event, even in those pioneer days of hardship, the club women and school children of North Dakota, in co-operation with the state legislature, provided funds for the erection of the bronze statue of Sakakawea which stands on the east side of the state capital grounds at Bismarck—facing west.

A Landmark in History

RICHMOND, the capital of Virginia, occupying seven hills, is ofttimes and quite naturally referred to as the modern Rome.

This aristocratic old city has been greatly to the fore in the history of our country. Think of the prominent part it played in the Civil war! Going beyond that, St. John's church—a plain, simple frame structure, with a square, four-story steeple, topped by a cross and surrounded by a very ancient burying ground, was the scene of history-making times which led up to the Revolutionary war.

This Episcopal house of worship, built about 1740 and subsequently enlarged considerably, was the meeting place of the Virginia convention in 1775. Two delegates from every county in Virginia, which at that time included what is now West Virginia and Kentucky, had come together to discuss the paramount question of American independence.

It was on this occasion that Patrick Henry arose and delivered the speech which made him famous and ended with these words: "Is life so dear, is peace so sweet, as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery? Forbid it, Almighty God! I know not what course others may take; but, as for me, give me liberty or give me death!"

These stirring words were one of the inciting factors which pledged Virginia to the war of the American Revolution, that resulted in our present form of government.

This historic landmark is well preserved to this day—Patrick Henry's pew being marked with a brass plate.

SENT BY RURAL DELIVERY

By EMMA W. BROSS

(Copyright, by W. G. Chapman.)

THE good-looking but modest postman on Rural Route 21, District K, experienced a token of interest and a flutter of expectation as he neared the half-tubular zinc receptacle labeled "Adam Foster."

Beyond, at the end of a leafy-roofed arcade two hundred feet long, was the substantial, inviting-looking old farmhouse. It held three daughters and two sons. In one of them young Worth Merrill was especially interested. A shy, blushing, fluttering young creature, the morning previous she had flitted down the shady lane to the side of the mail cart, light and graceful as some fairy.

He had handed her some letters addressed to her father and a couple of magazines. She had smiled upon him in a way that set his nerves tingling. In her embarrassment she had dropped letters and bundles. Their heads had bumped together as they stooped mutually to recover them. Then both had smiled.

"Could you—would you—that is, I must get a small package to Nellie Blake—you know?—the next farmhouse."

"Surely," assented Merrill eagerly.

"I can't go there and I can't wait to have it mailed."

"As a private individual I am at your service," bowed Merrill.

"Oh, thank you!" and Pearl Foster handed him a neat parcel, smiled bewitchingly and flitted away like a frightened fawn.

The Blake home was the last farmhouse on Merrill's route. He delivered the package to Miss Blake and went on his way, dreaming fondly of the lovely girl who had broken the ice of a mutual acquaintance.

Merrill looked eagerly for his charming ideal the next day, but it was raining, so she did not come down to the mail box at the road. The next afternoon was fair, but the farm path leading up to the house was muddy. From the porch, however, Pearl made urgent gestures, apparently directing the attention of Merrill to a package on top of the letter box.

Merrill saw that it exactly resembled the one he had delivered to Miss Blake two days previous. It felt soft and fluffy and he decided it was some article of feminine adornment, a lace collar, an embroidered handkerchief, or the like. Merrill had heard that the elder sister of Miss Blake was about to be married. This new parcel, he theorized, might be a contribution to a prospective linen shower.

At all events he took it up, waved it at Pearl to indicate that he understood, and his pulse heightened as she vigorously bobbed her pretty head and smiled radiantly.

At the last delivery point Merrill had picked a spray of forget-me-nots. He released the tiny thing of beauty from his buttonhole and placed it between two letters directed to Pearl. Then he went on his way.

The next afternoon he sighted Pearl again on the porch. He hoped she would come to the road in person for the mail. Merrill even waved the letters intended for the house invitingly.

But coy Pearl betrayed an inexplicable shyness. She made a gesture and half hid behind a post. On top of the mail box was a fine bouquet of red roses.

"Ah, another errand to Miss Blake?" soliloquized Merrill, taking up the pretty flowers. He raised them to inhale their delicate perfume. Then his heart beat fast. Was it fancy? Could it be reality? Pearl had wafted him a light kiss with a lighter cooing laugh, and had flown into the house as if hiding some conscious guilt in a breach of decorum.

Miss Blake stared strangely at Merrill as he handed her the bouquet. She looked at him as if misunderstanding. Then she smiled quietly, but she took the flowers and thanked him.

By this time Merrill was head over heels in love with Pearl. His heart fluttered as he hoped that she was interested in him. But the next morning she did not even appear on the porch. The second morning she passed across the lawn, her chin high in the air. She actually turned her back upon him.

The third morning there was a sheet of paper across the mail box. It bore one word:

"Stupid!"

Merrill went his way, pondering. When his route was finished he dropped the reins of the old horse, sat back in the gig listlessly and saw life and all its hopes and motives drop into a sea of despairing gloom.

"What does it mean?" he murmured dejectedly. "'Stupid'—surely! It was meant for me, but why? why?"

The horse, left guideless, had strayed from the road into a thicket. In his present joyless mood Merrill allowed him to graze. His day's labors were over and he was in a frame of mind where solitude was a boon. Suddenly, however, Merrill was startled by the echo of a vivid scream.

"That is a woman's voice!" he decided, and leaped from the gig and dashed through the underbrush in the direction from which the cry had sounded. He came to an abrupt halt where a path intersected the wildwood.

Miss Blake stood rigid with fear, confronted by a brawny tramp, who, cudgel in hand, menaced her.

"Out with your purse and off with your jewelry, my pretty!" ordered the man, and then he went sprawling at a well-directed blow from the strong fist of Merrill and made off baffled, as Merrill caught the half-fainting girl in his arms.

Miss Blake was hysterical with gratitude, but in a few moments had somewhat regained her composure.

"I had just left Pearl—that is, Miss Foster," she explained, "when that horrid man came along."

"Then perhaps that fellow has started after her—began Merrill in an anxious tone.

"Oh, she is surely home by this time," interrupted Miss Blake. Then she paused. There seemed to be something on her mind. She finally placed a pleading hand on his own.

"You have been so good to me," she spoke falteringly, "I think I should tell you something about—about Pearl.

"Anything about Miss Foster will be of infinite importance to me," assured Merrill ardently.

"But—but it is a breach of confidence, perhaps." She hesitated. Then she burst out. "It was about those flowers."

"Oh, the roses Miss Foster sent you."

"She did not mean them for me."

"Indeed?" questioned Merrill puzzled.

"No. They were intended for—you."

"For me? Oh, I understand now!" cried Merrill in a quick, comprehensive gasp. "Why, I never dreamed of such a thing!"

"Your forget-me-nots—"

"I fancied she would scarcely notice them."

"Was it not a floral message?" intimated Miss Blake archly.

"And the roses were—"

"A reply. In the language of flowers—you should feel honored."

"And 'Stupid,' indeed, was I!" exclaimed Merrill, joyously.

"Poor Pearl!" continued Miss Blake. "She had been searching the woods for some gruesome plant that would express her heartbreak."

"She need not, if the assurance that I read her good will aright at last and am eager to tell her how happy she has made me!" orated Merrill in a riotous fervor of delight.

"Suppose—suppose you come over to our house tonight?" gently suggested Miss Blake.

"Suppose I do?" submitted Merrill hopefully.

"Pearl will be there. You can tell her all about your modest mistake."

Which Merrill did, in a quiet corner of the pretty garden, amid sleeping roses, and the chiming crickets, and the sweet white moonlight and—love!

Much Material Today for Interesting Diary

It is a thousand pities that the very fact of her more crowded and more interesting existence makes very difficult for the modern woman the keeping of an old-fashioned diary in a new-fashioned manner.

It is undeniably true that a sort of mystic charm emanates from the pages of the humblest old-world "journal intime." And how much more absorbing would be the day-to-day chronicle of a woman merged in the swift movement of these times.

The modern woman would fill her diary with records that would build up the gradual mosaic of her changed domestic designs and portray the quickening spirit of change in the household regime that has given her a larger liberty; with records of the innumerable ways in which she has used that new freedom to express her inner self.

It would be stimulating to know that somewhere among the ranks of women there has been a resurrection of the diary habit.

For, indeed, "one never can tell." The past has proved that the little natural, unaffected, faithfully recorded happenings and impressions of today can be the Literature—with a capital "L"—of tomorrow.

Great Railway Tunnels

Notable railway tunnels of the world are the Simplon in the Alps, connecting Italy and Switzerland, length 12 miles; Mount St. Gothard, connecting Italy and Switzerland 9¼ miles; Mount Cenis, also in the Alps, connecting France and Italy, 8 miles; Arlberg, in Austria, 6 miles; the Connaught, on the line of the Canadian Pacific railway, under Mount Macdonald, of the Selkirk range of the Rocky mountains, in British Columbia, 5 miles in length, with two railway tracks; the Hoosac Mountain tunnel, in western Massachusetts, 4¾ miles; the St. Clair tunnel, carrying the lines of the Canadian National railways under the St. Clair river, between Sarnia, Ont., and Port Huron, Mich., 2 miles.

In the Modern Way

A pretty girl was courted by a man of great wealth and a fellow of small means.

The former showered her with all varieties of costly gifts and feted her in sumptuous fashion. The impecunious one gave her only his devotion, for it was all he had to give. Still, devotion is a beautiful thing, even in these modern times.

So she fell in love with the poor fellow. But she married the rich one.

Dilemma

"Who is the greatest American statesman?"

"That's an embarrassing question," rejoined Senator Sorghum. "If I say I am, I'll be accused of egotism. If I say I'm not, my constituents will be disappointed."—Washington Star.

Suspenders Stretch: His Life Is Saved

Merced, Calif.—The life of Frank Smith, inmate of the Merced county jail, hung by a pair of suspenders the other morning. They stretched, and he lived.

Smith, serving a six months' sentence for disturbing the peace, attempted suicide by hanging. But the suspenders which he used for a noose stretched when he jumped from a cot in his cell, and his toes reached to the floor.

Found a few minutes later by officers, he was cut loose and quickly revived.

WIFE IS PRICE OF WINNING MILLIONS

Hungary's Richest Nobleman Shoots Self in Despair.

Budapest, Hungary.—In a sumptuous apartment in a hotel here, Count Joseph Daun, Hungary's richest nobleman, heard that a court had decided a lawsuit involving $30,000,000 in his favor.

Within an hour in his room a shot rang out. Employees of the hotel found the count with a bullet wound in his chest. He had shot himself.

Count Daun's wife was Emma Erdody, whose blond, pearl-like loveliness was the toast of Hungary. His two uncles, Count Nicholas and Count John, died and left him their combined fortunes, equivalent to $30,000,000.

Count Daun had to sue to obtain possession of the estates. A long struggle ensued. During five years the case passed from one court to another. The count's time was so taken up that he seldom saw his wife.

When Count Daun learned that the fortune was finally in his possession his first thoughts turned to his wife. She must be the first to know, he told himself.

He telephoned her the news, but she interrupted him coldly.

"I am not interested in your millions," said the wife. "You can have your victory. You may have won your case, but you have lost me. I don't wish to see you again."

The count fell into an hour of black despair, at the end of which he turned his pistol on himself. When his wife learned of her husband's deed she hurried to him. She wept and forgave him.

Steal Only Nightgowns Then Burn Buildings

McAlester, Okla.—Citizens living in the vicinity of Alderson, Okla., are terror-stricken and using the old wartime method of standing guard over their property at night as the result of a number of mysterious fires which have taken a toll of six or seven houses and barns during the last five months.

Before the burning of the buildings, the homes of the owners have been entered some time prior to fire, but only one time was anything taken except nightgowns.

From the home of George Smith the arsonist took two nightgowns and a shotgun. Two days later Smith lost his barn and live stock by fire.

The barn of John Jones was burned to the ground. The day before the fire his home was entered and a nightgown stolen. The gown was found later cut to shreds in a field near the house.

On the night of December 16 Morris Hillyer was guarding his barn armed with a shotgun. He lay down for a few minutes' rest, and almost immediately his barn was afire all over.

Husband Warns Against Wife, but He's Too Late

Berlin.—Advertising columns in the local newspaper of Kalkberge, a suburb of Berlin, displayed the following announcement.

"I warn everybody against lending money to my wife Helen, as I refuse to meet her obligations. (Signed) Fritz Woratschek."

On the following day the same column contained another announcement reading:

"Dear Fritz—Don't worry. I've already borrowed all I need. All you need to do is to pay up. (Signed) Helen Woratschek."

Forgot to Tie Homes; Wind Blew 'Em Away

St. Michael, Alaska.—Natives on St. Lawrence island, in Bering sea, who last summer brought a number of knockdown houses in Seattle, forgot to fasten them down. This week the winter's first severe wind storm started the light wooden structures skidding over the level frozen surface, several families suddenly finding themselves in strange neighborhoods. To forestall another such violent move the houses are stayed by rawhide lariats thrown over them and tied to huge boulders.

Hard on Elopers

Jeffersonville, Ind.—Elopers are going to find things more difficult in this Gretna Green. It seems that marrying squires employ runners to approach prospects in depots and automobiles and on ferries. Chief of Police Clegg gave notice that an ordinance forbidding such solicitation will be enforced.

If Kidneys Act Bad Take Salts

Says Backache Often Means You Have Not Been Drinking Enough Water

When you wake up with backache and dull misery in the kidney region it may mean that you have been eating foods which create acids, says a well-known authority. An excess of such acids overworks the kidneys in their effort to filter it from the blood and they become sort of paralyzed and loggy. When your kidneys get sluggish and clog you must relieve them, like you relieve your bowels, removing all the body's urinous waste, else you have backache, sick headache, dizzy spells; your stomach sours, tongue is coated and when the weather is bad you have rheumatic twinges. The urine is cloudy, full of sediment, channels often get sore, water scalds and you are obliged to seek relief two or three times during the night.

Either consult a good, reliable physician at once or get from your pharmacist about four ounces of Jad Salts; take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help clean and stimulate sluggish kidneys, also to neutralize acids in the system, so they no longer irritate, thus often relieving bladder weakness.

Jad Salts is inexpensive, cannot injure and makes a delightful, effervescent lithia-water drink. Drink lots of soft water.

Moving Mountain Range

The Andes—the longest mountain system on earth, covering a line of 4,500 miles in length—are moving! So claims Dr. Bailey Willis, a noted American scientist.

Moreover, Doctor Willis traces the cause of earthquakes in Japan and Chile to the heaving of this mass of gold and silver and copper, of lead and iron and tin, and of earth and stones. It was the moving of the Californian mountains that caused the San Francisco earthquake in 1906, adds Doctor Willis.

Recent tests are said to prove that salesmen are able to obtain the best results while wearing dark, plain-colored neckties, and that the worst results came while wearing polka-dot ties. It would appear from this that such dotted ties have a tendency to distract the buyer's attention from the importance of the dotted line.

—15—

Wide-eyed, she stared, and it was a long moment ere she understood the poetic justice that he meted out to her. When at last her voice came, it came in a hoarse cry of horror.

"Wed him? Wed him! He is infected—"

"With your venom," Cesare cut in crisply. And he continued calmly as one reasoning with a wayward child: "It is your duty to yourself and him. You are in honor bound by your compact. The poor fellow could not foresee all this. You had not made him privy to your plans. You called to me for justice, Madonna," he reminded her. "Thus you receive it. It is complete, I think. I hope it satisfies you."

Her anger shivered itself unuttered against that iron dominance of his. Before it her spirit left her utterly, her high courage ebbed like water, and she became again the prey of fear and horror.

"Oh, not that! Not that!" she cried to him. "Mercy! Mercy! As you would hope for mercy in your need, have mercy on me now." He looked sardonically at Ser Pantaleone, who sat his horse, benumbed in body and in brain.

"Madonna Fulvia does not flatter you, Pantaleone," said he. "She has little fancy for you as a bridegroom, it appears. Yet, fool, you believed her when she promised to take you to husband. You believed her! Ha! What was it Fra Serafino said of you?" He fell thoughtful. "I remember! He found you too full in the lips to be trusted with a woman. He knows his world, Fra Serafino. So you succumbed to her promises! But be comforted. She shall fulfill them, where she thought to cheat you. She shall take you to that white breast of hers—you and the plague you carry with you."

"Oh God!" she panted. "Will you wed me to death?"

"Is it possible," he wondered, "that you can find death more repulsive than Pantaleone? Yet consider," he begged her, reasoning dispassionately, "that I do naught by you that you would not have done by me." He began with infinite caution to peel off the heavy gauntlet of buffalo hide with which he had handled that death-dealing tube. "After all," he resumed, "if to keep your word is beyond measure odious to you—a family trait with you, Madonna, as I have cause to know—I may show you the way to escape its consequences. There is a way that some would account to be consistent with honor. Cancel the bargain that you made with him, and thus cancel the obligation to fulfill your part and to submit to his embrace."

"Cancel it? How cancel it?" she asked.

"Is it not plain? By surrendering Matteo Orsini to me. Deliver him up to me this day, and the night shall be free from nuptials that are distasteful to you."

She understood at once the satanic subtlety of this man; she saw how far removed he was from any petty vengeance such as she had suspected him to be gratifying; she was but an insignificant pawn in the deep game he played; her feelings were to him no more than the means to the one end of which never for an instant had he lost sight—the capture of Matteo Orsini. That was all that mattered to him, and he was not to be turned aside by any considerations of anger toward herself. He had terrified her with the threat of this unutterable marriage, simply that he might render her pliant to his will, ready to pay any price of treachery to escape that ghastly fate.

"Deliver him up to you?" she said, and it was her turn to smile at last, but with infinitely bitter scorn.

"Could aught be easier?" he asked. "There is no need to tell me even where he lurks. I do not ask you to betray him, or do aught that would hurt your tender Orsini sensibilities." His sarcasm was as a sword of fire. "You need but to send him word of the plight into which your essay in poisoning has landed you. That is all. As he is a man, he must come hither to ransom you from the consequences of your deed. Let him come before nightfall, or else"—he shrugged, flung his gauntlets down into the mud, and nodded his head toward the stricken Pantaleone—"you keep your bargain; you pay the price agreed upon for his escape, and myself I shall provide the nuptial banquet."

She looked at him with a deep malignity aroused by his own relentlessness and by the hateful suavity in which he cloaked it. And then her wits roused themselves to do battle with his own. She saw how subtlety might yet defeat subtlety. And as the idea crept into her fevered mind, the blood came slowly back into her livid cheeks, her glance grew bold and resolute as it met his own.

"Be it so," she said. "You leave me no choice, magnificent." Her voice came harsh and something mocking. "It shall be as you desire. I will send my servant to him now."

He gave her a long, searching glance which at first was grave and doubting, and ended by becoming almost contemptuous. He made a sign to his cavaliers.

"Let us on, sirs. Here is no more to do." But he stooped from his saddle to issue an order in an undertone to Della Volpe who throughout had stood beside him. Then, flicking his horse with the slight whip which he carried, he moved on across the square, his fluttering attendants with him. He rode away with contempt in his heart. He knew this Orsini brood. They were all the same. Bold to devise, but craven to execute; their brains were stouter than their hearts. Their stiffness crumpled at the touch.

CHAPTER VIII

Erect and stiff upon her horse sat Madonna Fulvia, bemused, half-dazed, indifferent to the gaping crowd that by now surrounded her, but keeping its distance out of respect for the disease with which Pantaleone was accounted laden.

She was roused at length by a groom dressed in black with a bull wrought in red upon the breast of his doublet, who stepped forward to take her reins, whilst at the same time Della Volpe addressed her, his tone respectful, but his single eye contemptuous.

"Madonna," he said, "I pray you go with us. I have my lord's commands for your entertainment."

She looked at him, sneering at first at the euphemism he had employed by which to convey to her that she was a prisoner. But something in that veteran's rugged face struck the sneer from her lips. Two things she read in that countenance: the first, that he was honest; the second, that he contemned her action.

Her glance grew troubled, and it fell away from him.

"Do you lead the way, then, sir," she said. "My equerry here accompanies me, I think." And she indicated Mario, who sat his horse rigidly behind her, a dumb anguish in his dark eyes.

"Naturally, Madonna, since he is to be your messenger. Forward, Giasone," he commanded; and upon that, the groom leading her horse, Della Volpe striding grimly beside her and Mario riding as grimly in her wake, she moved forward toward the Communal palace whither by Cesare's orders they were taking her.

As for the wretched Pantaleone, she scarce bestowed another thought upon him. He had been no more than a pawn in this game of hers, even as she was become one now in the deeper game of the duke's.

She had observed, though with but faint interest, that a half-dozen arbalesters had charge of him. These men, under the command of an ancient, showed no relish for this task of apprehending one who was so armed that without raising a finger he could fling death about him. Accordingly they kept their distance. They made a wide ring about their prisoner, each with a quarrel laid to his arbalest, and thus they urged him away, threatening to shoot him if he were disobedient.

When at last he had been removed in this fashion, a man in the Borgia livery came forward with a flaming torch to within a couple of yards of the pestilential parchment that still lay where it had fallen. Thence he flung his torch upon it, nor went to recover it again. Torch and plague-laden parchments were consumed together, in spite of which, so runs the story, the good folk of Citta della Pieve went wide of the spot for days thereafter.

Spanish Heather Honey

In Spain there are several fine honeys, and one, the lime-tree honey of Cataluna, is as green as jade and has a scented taste; but is less highly esteemed than the heather honey from the slopes of the Pyrenees. Indeed, Spaniards claim for this, as did the Athenians of old for the honey of Mount Hymettus, that it is the food of the gods, so exquisite is its flavor.

Middle-Age Philosophy

Scholasticism was the philosophy of the schools of the Middle Ages. It represented an attempt to fuse the beliefs of the church with the logic of Aristotle. The greatest teachers of the scholastic method were those of the Thirteenth century, among them being Albertus Magnus, Roger Bacon, Duns Scotus, and Thomas Aquinas. The latter, known as the "Angel of the Schools," outlined the whole scheme of Roman Catholic theology in his "Summa Theologia." Though the latter scholastics busied themselves with many unprofitable speculations—such as "How many angles can be supported on the point of a needle?"—the whole movement was valuable in awakening the mental life of Europe from the lethargy of the previous centuries, and in preparing the way for the revival of classical learning known as the Renaissance.

It Was a Lively Evening

By DUFORD JENNE

(Copyright.)

DALE SANBORN looked over the gay and shining crowd that had assembled for the dance at the Van Dorne mansion and told himself that he was in for a tame evening. His ankle was lame from a recent accident; his friend, Gus Van Dorne, would forget him promptly since the fiancee of Gus was present; and Dale was practically unknown to the rest.

"What a chump I was to accept Gus' invitation!" Dale grunted to himself as he walked the corridor outside the brilliant ballroom.

Then he saw her!

She had bent over a huge bowl of roses, and was breathing their fragrance. With her dark head, her long-lashed eyes, the swift curve of her throat and neck, she made an attractive picture.

"There is a girl I am going to know if the heavens fall!" he decided, and set out in search of Gus. Gus, however, had for the time vanished with his fiancee. So Dale returned to his first haunt where he had seen the rose girl.

She too, had vanished, but as he hastened through the door opening into the wide hall of the mansion he collided with somebody, and, backing away, found himself facing the rose girl.

"I beg your pardon!" he said a bit too gratefully. "I didn't see you!"

Her dark eyes twinkled as she said gravely: "I think that is evident. I am sorry I delayed you." She started to pass.

"Washington told the truth because he did not have time to hatch it," Dale said quickly. "It's the same with me; the truth is I was looking for you."

"For me?" she asked, her dark eyes growing a bit suspicious.

"You," he answered frankly. "I know that you are not dancing, and neither am I. Let's sneak out and enjoy this Southern night."

She hesitated, then smiled faintly. "I vote with you. Let's go—but I must not stay too long."

Outside in the fragrant dusk they strolled back and forth chatting of this and that; and Dale knew in a few minutes that he had found the girl he did not intend to lose—if he could help it.

But suddenly she stopped. "Really, I must go inside."

"But—" he began.

But she was gone. He stood a moment disconsolate and puzzled, felt for a cigarette, then remembered that he had forgotten his case, had borrowed a cigarette from Gus and had seen Gus put his case in his top-coat pocket. So Dale started for the cloakroom.

When there he found some difficulty in locating Gus' coat, and looked hastily through the pockets of two or three of the coats before he located the right one. Then he put Gus' case in his pocket and strolled out. As he did so, he saw the rose girl, but she vanished before he could hail her.

As he walked the terrace outside, smoking and dreaming, he saw her slight white form coming toward him. Then he saw two figures behind her—burly ones. She and they stopped in front of him.

"Here he is!" she said quietly.

Dale found his arms suddenly pinioned by two blue-coated men.

"What is this? A joke?" Dale asked.

"If it is true, it's on you. Miss Gordon was assigned to this affair to keep an eye on pickpockets and sneak thieves, and I guess you qualify," one of the men said bluntly. "She says she saw you going through the coats in the men's cloakroom."

"Right, but—hold on! I happen to be a college pal of Van Dorne. If you get him, he'll clear this up," Dale said, angry, yet amused.

The rose girl vanished; and a few moments later she returned with Gus. Gus looked him over with cold eyes.

"I never saw this chap before in my life!" he said darkly, and Dale got his second shock, relieved only by Dale's subconscious realization that some light of hope went out of the rose girl's face, clear in the light from the great windows.

Dale came to himself. "Gus—confound you! I'll get even with you—" he stuttered as the officers started to lead him away.

Gus' hearty laugh saved the situation. "Hold on, men. He's an old pal of mine. He was after my cigarettes—that case is mine."

"All right, then," Dale said grimly. "Now, if you'll all get out of here except Miss Gordon, I'll call it quits."

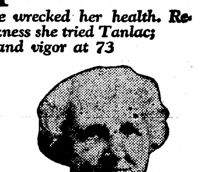
She stood silent till the others had vanished; then she stepped close to him. "Really, I am awfully sorry, but, you see, this isn't my real work. I am an art student, and—and I did this to help out—I—"

He caught her hand. "I thought this was going to be a tame evening. Thanks to you, it isn't. Now suppose I help you keep an eye on the precious jewelry of Gus' crowd; and then afterward—" He paused.

"Afterward," she repeated, slipping her arm through his hesitatingly, but as if in indication of surrender.

"Afterward I want to see you home," he said, not trying to keep the note of happiness from his voice; "and now promise you won't try to escape me!"

"I promise," she said softly, and the note in her voice echoed the note in his.



Aged Aberdeen Lady Tells Experience

10 years of stomach trouble wrecked her health. Reduced to extreme weakness she tried Tanlac; enjoys strength and vigor at 73

Mrs. C. A. Warner lives at 502 S. First St., Aberdeen, S. D., happy and healthy. She told about the distressing illness which wrecked her health and of her rapid recovery. "For about ten years," she said, "nervous indigestion caused me a lot of misery. My nerves were on edge; my limbs and feet badly swollen. I was in dreadful pain, looked thin and worn, and looked no worse than I felt.

"The slightest exertion was a big effort to me then, and I tired easily. Nothing seemed to give me relief. Finally I tried Tanlac and from the very first bottle a marked improvement showed. The swelling vanished from limbs and feet, and the pain went, too. I am quite active now, my movements are brisk and free from pain. I took but five bottles of Tanlac and to these alone my complete recovery and present robust health are due. I give Tanlac full credit for all it has done."

Mrs. Warner is but one of the many thousands of women whom Tanlac has built up to rugged health and strength. If you are below par, get a trial bottle today. Tanlac is nature's own remedy, made from herbs, roots and barks. Your druggist has it. Over 52 million bottles already sold.

Precision of Time Marvel of Science

Absolute exactness in the measurement of time is a scientific ideal that may forever elude human attainment, but the bureau of standards at Washington has just worked out a method that comes nearer to it than have any previous efforts in the field.

The device will record half-second intervals which may be substantially depended upon, the bureau says, to be accurate to "within a few parts in 100,000," a desirable condition in laboratory work where the utmost exactness gauging the speed and duration of phenomena is sought.

There is no particular complexity about the new device. Its central feature is a pendulum with a slit through the center, and a light back of it. As the swinging pendulum passes the proper point, light flashes through the orifice and falls on a sensitive surface in front. A tiny electric current thus generated in the sensitive surface is amplified as in radio practice, and a moving photographic film records the instant.

The Shiftless Policy

Secretary Wilbur, at a Washington dinner party, complained about the lack of appropriations, which prevent him from keeping the navy at full strength.

"A shiftless policy in appropriating money," he said, "is as unsatisfactory as a shiftless policy in any other affair. It reminds me of a little story.

"'I've only got two clean pairs of socks,' a man complained one morning, 'and, they've both got holes in them.'

"His wife examined the socks. Then she said:

"'Put on both pairs, dear. The holes are in different places.'"

Iceland Once a Republic

Iceland was an independent republic from 930 to 1263, when it joined with Norway. Both countries came under Danish rule in 1381. When Norway separated from Denmark in 1814, Iceland remained under Denmark. In 1918 Denmark acknowledged Iceland as a sovereign state, united with Denmark only in that the Danish king was also to be king of Iceland.

Origin of "Limerick"

Limericks were usually extemporaneous compositions and produced at convivial parties in Ireland by each individual in turn, while the entire party joined in singing a chorus in which were the words, "Will you come up to Limerick?" From this it is supposed that the word "limerick," applied to a special type of poetry, is derived.

Rev. S. L. Tallakson of Thief River was here Saturday and conducted the funeral services for Andrew Arnevik.

As the southbound mail now goes half hour earlier, all letters and parcels must be mailed by two o'clock.

From now on it will be impossible to wait on both village and country people between trains, therefore those in and near town should mail their letters and parcels and get their money orders in the forenoon.

A little cooperation on the part of the public will greatly help us at this time of the year.

Henry Young, Postmaster.

You wouldn't stand for this One Minute

Left-over butter must be saved for another meal, but how about the "left-over" butter-fat which your present separator leaves in the skim-milk? It isn't at all unusual for a new De Laval to increase the yield of butter-fat from the milk of just a few cows by a quarter to a pound or more a day. Think what this would mean to you in the course of a year.

Trade in your old separator

Your old separator—no matter what its make or condition—will be accepted as partial payment for the wonderful new De Laval which will make it possible for you to get this extra butter-fat.

The new De Laval is by far the finest separator ever made. It skims cleaner under all conditions of use, runs easier, lasts longer, and gives you a rich, smooth, high-testing cream. Let us show you.

J. P. Augustine tops the January list by a wide margin. Arno Steinhauer holds down 2nd place with ease. Bill Mehrkens let C. A. Davis nose him out for 3rd place in our December report, but judging from this month's record, he must have put speedgears on his Holsteins, as he landed in third place; however, Davis is satisfied to exchange places with Bill Mehrkens, and I am sure that he will feel just as happy as heretofore.

Mrs. J. D. Holst holds 5th place for the 5th time. It is very noticeable the way Benitt is trying to get on top of the world. Here he ranks 6th on the list and no one heard him go by. A fair warning from someone who knows, tells me that Benitt is very apt to take an extra step or two before the February report is published.

I am trying hard to get enough of our patrons interested in a Cow-Testing Ass'n but it appears to be an uphill fight. The reason for this is that most patrons do not know the benefits to be derived from such an organization. Of late years the main topics for discussion have been Butterfat Prices, Keep Lots Of Cows, and Try And Deliver A Good Grade Of Cream. These three slogans are very important and no doubt mean considerable more money to the patrons that try and put them into effect than to the one that doesn't. Yet you might disagree with me that when. I tell you the price of butter, grade of cream and cooperating marketing, while they are important and necessary, are only a small part of what can be accomplished thru a Cow Testing Ass'n. I know of creameries that make twice as much butter as we do and yet have no more cows then we have. The average production per cow in our community is approximately 135 lbs., while the average for the state of Minn. is 165 lbs. The average for the state is low, yet since the cow-testing associations begun their work the average has gone up and will continue to climb for many more years. Do not think that our cows are any worse than they are in the average community, but one of our big trouble lays in underfeeding or feeding the wrong kinds of feed. It is a known fact that where butterfat production has been raised by using better sires and better and right kind of feed, that wherever the patron spends $2 he receives in return $3. I have a list here at the creamery that we want at least 15 or 18 to sign. When we get that many we will call a meeting and organize with the help of Mr. Hanson, of the Extension Dept., University of Minnesota. He can show you figures that speak for themselves, in fact they will make you blush when you see for yourself what he has found in the different herds thruout the state. There is a case not over 60 miles from here where a member of the testing ass'n found that his 24 cows were very unprofitable and told the man in charge of their local testing ass'n to sell his 24 cows and get good ones for the money he received from the 24. This is what happened. He bought 8 good cows for the money he received from the 24 and whether you believe me or not they say he is getting a bigger cream check from his 8 than he did from the 24.

It is true that it takes $3 per member per month to belong to this testing Ass'n. I realize it looks like quite an amount for each patron, but I cannot see for the life of me why we should hold back when it is a known fact that in each and every case where they have such an association the members will get up in a crowd without being asked to in order to tell the rest what they made big money by joining their local testing ass'n. Like Mr. Hanson stated in his talk at Thief River Falls last week, He said that for a man to buy a high-priced clock and remove the hands and then try to tell the time is no more a hit and miss than to continue to milk cows without knowing whether it is this or that cow that makes me so much money for the year. I claim he is right and not until lately have I wokeup to the fact that it is time I get behind such a movement. Whether we organize or not, I am for it because I know it is right and the only way for our patrons to produce butterfat cheaply. Think it over and talk it over with your wife, be serious when you lay the facts before her, and figure out what it would mean to you if your butterfat production could be raised 10 or 15 lbs. per cow, not forgetting that such is happening in many herds with two or more cows less than you had before you joined the testing ass'n. It is unbelievable what will be found after you have been a member for a year.

QUANTITY PRODUCTION BY EXPERTS

Two hundred years ago every household raised its own food, made its own clothes, brewed its own medicines and furnished its own light. Every member of the family worked very hard from early dawn to late candle light, yet, enjoyed few comforts and conveniences. The people began to specialize and found Quantity Production by Experts to be much more efficient and satisfactory.

After the day of the candle and the kerosene lamp came an electrical generating station in each town of any size. Now we see most of these small plants closed down and an increasingly large proportion of communities served by transmission lines from big power plants. Quantity Production by Experts provides cheaper and better electric service just as it provides cheaper and better shoes and automobiles.

HENRY FORD ON HIS OLD HOMESTEAD AT THE AGE OF 19

U. S. EXPLORER FINDS NEW SEEDS FOR FARM

Brings Back Plants From Orient After Long Search.

Washington.—P. H. Dorsett, agricultural explorer for the United States Department of Agriculture, recently returned to the United States after two and a half years of searching in China and the tropical islands of Sumatra, Java, and Ceylon for plants that may be useful in American agriculture. With the assistance of his son, J. H. Dorsett, he made thousands of selections of seeds, plants, scions, bulbs, tubers and cuttings.

This plant material, after passing inspection to determine its freedom from insect pests and diseases, and after being grown for a time in detention as an additional safeguard against the introduction of pests, will be sent to scientific workers of the department, state experiment stations and other testing gardens to determine its adaptability to our conditions of soil and climate, its possible use for breeding work, and other qualities. Such testing takes considerable time, often requiring ten years or more, before the worth of a particular introduction has been sufficiently established to warrant giving it to the public.

Interest in New Varieties.

Because of the importance of wheat and barley in this country and the increasing importance of soy beans and mungo beans, special attention was given to securing new varieties of these crops.

What is considered as perhaps the best collection of soy bean varieties ever brought to the United States is the one collected by the Dorsetts in Manchuria with the help of B. W. Skvortzow, a Russian botanist teaching agriculture in the high school in Harbin, Manchuria. Upon learning the mission of the Americans he planted 100 varieties of soy beans in the local botanical garden. When the Dorsetts visited the place in the fall after harvest they were told to take what they wanted, plant and all.

This willing foresight on the part of the Russian scientist enabled these explorers to send the 100 varieties of soy beans to the United States in their entirety, thus saving investigators in this country a year's time in securing material for study.

It is estimated that 70 per cent of the soy beans grown in China are produced in Manchuria and that upward of 9,000,000 acres in that region is devoted to this crop. Something like 4,000,000 acres of soy beans were grown in the United States last year as a result of previous introductions. It is hoped that among the new varieties will be found some that are suitable for culture in regions farther north in this country and in other sections where the crop is not now grown.

Mungo Beans of Importance.

Mungo beans is another staple crop in Manchuria and many parts of China proper which is of coming economic importance in the United States, said Mr. Dorsett. In their native country they are used as mungo beans sprouts, and are an important scource of their best bean vermicelli.

Sixty per cent of the barley grown in the United States is the result of one introduction from Manchuria. Many varieties of barley were included in the collection because of their possibilities.

Mr. Dorsett will ultimately receive more than 500 seed packets of wheat, barley, soy beans and other grains from the far corners of northern Manchuria where agricultural explorers have been unable to penetrate. No railroads enter that region and mail, carried by foot runners, may be several months on the way. Through the co-operation of the postal commissioner of Manchuria, D. McLorn, samples of these major crops are being secured from each of the areas served by 500 rural postal stations.

Many packets of seeds have already come in and others are continually being received. When the collection is finally accumulated it will be a valuable source of new plant material for direct production and also for selection and plant breeding experiments; and one that was made at a very slight cost to the United States, so far as the actual cost of the plant material is concerned.

The expedition was further aided by the Chinese Eastern railroad, through the hearty co-operation of M. K. Gordeye, chief of the land department, in supplying to the United States Department of Agriculture explorers, free of expense, a private car completely equipped with living quarters. They were thus enabled to travel from station to station, making stops of a week or more to travel on foot into the interior.

South Indian Moslem Women to Discard Veils

Bangalore, India.—Following the example of their Turkish sisters, the Moslem ladies of south India at a gathering of 1,000 representatives adopted a resolution to discard the traditional veil which they claim is imposed by custom and not by religion.

Mrs. Mirza Ismail, wife of the new Moslem prime minister of the Hindu state of Mysore, presided at the conference, which challenged the orthodox religious parties to produce "from the text of the Koran anything enforcing the wearing of a veil."

This unexpected action has created a stir in the south Indian Moslem world.

FOSSIL BED CLEW TO ANCIENT LIFE

Find Tracks of Prehistoric Birds and Animals.

McPherson, Kan.—A heretofore unknown bed of fossil tracks, clearly revealing traces of strange birds and animals which stalked the southwestern part of the United States thousands of years ago, has been located by Prof. H. H. Nininger, head of the biology department of McPherson college.

Footprints of 19 different kinds of animals and birds found in the bed have been segregated and identified by their tracks and some of them, Professor Nininger declares, are new to modern science.

Reading of the Kansas biologist's work in unearthing fossils of a giant prehistoric animal of the cat family in central Arizona last April, Lee Means, a rancher living near Valentine, Texas, wrote him saying there were some unusual imprints in hard flintlike rock on his farm.

Professor Nininger went to the Means ranch, not far from the Mexican border, and investigated the imprints. He believes that country was, in prehistoric days, a large shallow lake, the bottom of which was covered with a stiff muck. On this muck the animals and birds walked, leaving their tracks firmly imprinted.

Then came a time when the land was submerged with a sediment known as anhydrite, closely related to gypsum. All of this was again beneath other sediments to a depth of from 150 to 200 feet and on top of this a 150-foot layer of basaltic lava flowed. During the pleistocene period, possibly from 50,000 to 100,000 years ago, a great upheaval broke up the formations and a stream has since brought to view the fossilized tracks, embedded in the rock which resembles flint.

Tolstoy Grave Hidden by Nine Great Oaks

Yasnaya Polyana, Russia.—Unmarked and unadorned, the grave of Count Leo Tolstoy, great Russian writer and philosopher, remains hidden in his beloved woods where neither the voice nor footsteps of man intrude.

The author of "War and Peace" sleeps under a simple mound of clay surrounded by nine great oak trees in the depths of the forest near where he was born almost a hundred years ago.

The house in which he was born was removed many years ago, to be supplanted by the ten-room brick and frame house in which he passed most of his life and wrote his masterpieces. Time, weather and neglect have dealt severely with it, but the soviet government has set aside a sum for its maintenance as a museum.

Miss Alexandra Tolstoy, the writer's youngest daughter, has charge of the house and surrounding estate. She guards his books, family heirlooms and personal possessions with maternal care.

Find Sailor Smuggling $125,000 Gems in Socks

New York.—Existence of an international smuggling ring using sailors on vessels leaving Belgian ports to smuggle large quantities of diamonds into this country, is suspected by customs officials, who have confiscated $125,000 in gems in the socks of a Belgian seaman.

Franz Tielemans, on a Red Star liner, had the stones, aggregating about 500 karats, in two packages, one concealed in each sock. He was arrested.

He told treasury agents he did not know the destination of the diamonds and said he merely had been instructed to deliver them to a man with a red handkerchief at an uptown street intersection after he had replied to a password.

Triangle Complicated by Husband's Double

Budapest.—A new version of the eternal triangle has been written here as a domestic drama with actual characters. Two attempted suicides and a blackmail suit occurred and the denouement is still in doubt. When an impecunious cousin, who is also the double of a wealthy business man, arrived here with a young Hungarian bride, he left her at a hotel and went to his office.

Alarmed at his prolonged absence, she called at the office where she saw a man who looked very much like her husband. When he refused to recognize her as his wife she bought a revolver and tried suicide. Romance entered the drama after the business man made calls at the hospital where his cousin's bride was convalescing. Falling in love with her and unable to straighten out the tangle, he instituted a blackmail impersonation suit, bought a pistol and tried suicide, but was prevented. All Budapest awaits the next move.

STATIC MAY PROVE STORM WARNING AID

State of Atmosphere and Currents Seen Related.

Washington.—Static, the bane of the radio fan who wants to get distant stations, may prove a valuable warning of such storms as the disastrous hurricane which struck Miami last September, according to a study made by the hydrographic office of the United States navy.

Beginning in March, 1924, the U. S. S. Kittery was used in a study of the value of weather maps in navigation. Before the experiments had been under way very long it was noticed that there was a very definite relation between the state of the atmosphere, as recorded in the data for weather maps broadcast from the naval radio station at Arlington, and the static. Later, when the weather maps were broadcast and received by means of the machine invented by C. Francis Jenkins, where a duplicate of the transmitted map is automatically drawn on the ship, it was found that the receiver could be used to record static.

The Jenkins machine is used in connection with a radio compass. The latter device is equipped with a loop antenna so that signals may be recorded from one definite direction. As the loop is rotated, and peals of static in any direction are detected by the receiver, corresponding ink lines are drawn on the paper-covered revolving drum of the Jenkins machine. In the time that it takes the recording pen to travel from one end of the drum to the other the loop is turned through a complete circle, so that the paper gives a graphic picture of the static in any direction from the observer.

Ship in Path of Storm.

The Kittery was fortunate enough, from the scientific viewpoint, to be in the path of the Miami hurricane of September, which was preceded by another hurricane that swept over Bermuda. On September 14, when the Kittery was east of Nassau, the Bermuda hurricane was a few hundred miles to the northeast and the Miami hurricane was approaching St. Thomas. The maximum of static was from a direction between these two storms. As the ship sailed south, and the Miami storm came nearer, while the Bermuda one went out of range, the static in the direction of the former became more intense. Finally, on September 16, after the Kittery had reached Cape Haitien, at the northwest tip of Haiti, and had made necessary preparations for rough weather, the ship and the storm met. The static was terrific in all directions.

By September 18 the Kittery was at Guantanamo, Cuba, and the storm was 600 miles distant, having crossed the Florida peninsula. There was relatively little static, except in the direction of the storm. Following the low pressure area of the hurricane, came one of high pressure, and on the morning of September 24, when the Kittery was near St. Thomas, no static whatever was recorded, the only time during the entire month that such a condition prevailed. Then, as the vessel started to sail northwest again, toward Cape Hatteras, another disturbance began to develop near Grand Turk island, and maximum static was recorded in its direction.

Hurricanes Develop Slowly.

Such hurricanes as the Miami one develop in the doldrums of the Atlantic ocean, off Cape Verde, the western tip of Africa, several weeks before they hit the United States. The Miami hurricane, for example, began about September 5, though it did not reach Florida until the 18th. It is suggested that a group of radio compass stations, located, perhaps, at San Juan, P. R., a point in the Barbados, and Trinidad, would be able to detect these storms as they approach. With three stations, where the lines from each cross would be the center of the storm, so that its position could be accurately plotted and sufficient time for warnings and preparation could be allowed.

The bureau of engineering of the Navy department is now working on a further attachment for the recording device which will record the intensity of the static in each direction, with which, it is expected still more reliable results may be obtained. An interesting fact learned in the data already obtained, however, with regard to the intensity of the static, is that it is much weaker than signals from powerful transmitting stations.

Prince of Wales Makes Yellow Shirts Possible

London.—Yellow hunting shirts, such as gentleman farmers wore during the Seventeenth century, are the big event of the present English hunting season.

London shopkeepers, who had to dust ancient boxes of the now revived style to meet the demand, are thanking the prince of Wales for the opportunity to unload what they have thought to be obsolete styles.

Ever since the prince appeared at the royal princes' hunt from Melton Mowbray in one of the skinfitting garments, shopkeepers have had continual streams of the prince's fashion followers demanding "yellow shirts."

Fair Profit

New York.—By air comes a story from London of a woman who paid 60 cents for a book and sold it for $10,200. It was a first edition of John Bunyan's "Book for Boys and Girls."

Golfer Falls Dead After His Best Drive

Miami, Fla.—After making what was said to be the best tee drive of his life, Thomas Wood, aged sixty-seven, of Orange, N. J., fell dead on the eighth tee of the Country club course here.

Wood led off in the driving from the tee, knocking a straight and far ball, and exclaimed that it was the best he had ever made. His companion drove and, turning to speak to Wood, found him lying dead on the grass.

TREASURE HUNTERS VEX HOME OWNER

Chest of Gold Believed Buried on Premises.

Baltimore.—Life in a house two centuries and a quarter old, with an iron chest full of gold popularly believed to be buried on the premises, is not all romance—in fact, it is downright annoying.

Miss Janet Ball lives in such a house on the outskirts of Baltimore. In 1771 an ancestor fitted together its hewn oak beams and raised its brick walls. In the Eighteenth century for two generations it passed from control of her family and Jean Champlaigne, French royalist, merchant prince and refugee, inhabited it—and planted both the gold and the annoyance.

Legend says that when he learned his fleet had been swept from the seas by privateers he rushed into the snow and buried $50,000 in gold, the remains of his fortune, in an iron chest. Negro laborers, gypsies, "sorcerers" and prowlers in general have never given up hope of finding it; and that is the annoyance.

Miss Ball is called by police on an average of once a month "to bail out colored folk just arrested for digging up our front yard. We always do, of course, because the negroes, having grown up in the traditions of the estate, are subject to temptation that is too great for them." Some one is digging about the place most of the time, with and without permission.

The old homestead was built by Robert Teale on a grant of 10,000 acres given Edwin Dorsey in 1650 by Lord Cromwell. Champlaigne bought it in 1800 when he fled the guillotine.

Uses Cold Shower Baths on Lazy Boys

Chester, Pa.—Charging that Herman Hoopes, physical instructor at the Smedley junior high school, punished his twelve-year-old son by putting him under cold shower baths because the boy did not bring his gym shoes to class, William Mann of 624 McIlvaine street appeared before the directors of the Chester public schools with a complaint against the teacher. Mann added that his son, Elwood, a seventh-grade pupil, was made ill as a result of the punishment. The children claimed, according to young Mann, that they were forced to put on their clothes over their wet bodies, as they did not bring towels to class and were punished for failure to bring gym shoes after they had been warned by the teacher, they said.

Mann stated his son was told by the physical instructor that Dr. Norman C. Cameron, superintendent of schools, had urged the "cold shower" punishment. Doctor Cameron immediately denied having heard of the matter.

The school board decided to investigate the charges promptly. Hoopes stated he felt the punishment was not above the ordinary and was justified as some of the children were lazy.

Poisons Daughter, Then Takes Rest Herself

Los Angeles, Calif.—"I gave my daughter cyanide because her illness was growing worse, and then drank what was left in the cup to kill myself," Mrs. K. B. Rigg, seventy-eight years of age, told Deputy Sheriff Croushorn and attendants in the psychopathic ward of the General hospital when accused of administering the poison which caused the death of her daughter, Mrs. Elizabeth Nation.

Mrs. Nation was found dead in her home, and her mother in an unconscious condition on the floor near the bed after Mrs. Nation's daughter, Mary, ran to a neighbor's house and spread the alarm.

Investigating officers reported Mrs. Nation had been ill with rheumatism for several months.

A coroner's inquest into Mrs. Nation's death resulted in a verdict of "death by cyanide poisoning administered by Mrs. K. B. Rigg, while in a despondent condition."

Suspected Slayer Held After 13 Years' Search

Chicago.—By a mere freak of chance, a man identified as the murderer of a policeman in Mineville, N. Y., more than 13 years ago has been arrested in Chicago.

William James, chief of police of Mineville, was stabbed to death in 1913. Tony Gajdyitz was suspected but could not be found. Thirteen years passed, and the murder was almost forgotten. Then a former resident of Mineville chanced to see Gajdyitz in a busy Chicago street. The man was arrested and has been identified as the officer's slayer, police declare. He must face trial

Drugs Excite the Kidneys, Drink Water

Take Salts at First Sign of Bladder Irritation or Backache

The American men and women must guard constantly against kidney trouble because we often eat too much rich food. Our blood is filled with acids which the kidneys strive to filter out; they weaken from overwork, become sluggish, the eliminative tissues clog and the result is kidney trouble, bladder weakness and a general decline in health.

When your kidneys feel like lumps of lead; your back hurts or the urine is cloudy, full of sediment, or you are obliged to seek relief two or three times during the night; if you suffer with sick headache, or dizzy, nervous spells, acid stomach, or if you have rheumatism when the weather is bad, begin drinking lots of good soft water and get from your pharmacist about four ounces of Jad Salts. Take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine.

This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help flush and stimulate clogged kidneys, to neutralize the acids in the system so they no longer are a source of irritation, thus often relieving bladder disorders.

Jad Salts is inexpensive, cannot injure, makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink and belongs in every home, because nobody can make a mistake by having a good kidney flushing any time.
